

long

NATURAL LAW AND THE THEORY OF SOCIETY

VOLUME II

LONDON

Cambridge University Press
FETTER LANE

NEW YORK · TORONTO

BOMBAY · CALCUTTA · MADRAS
Macmillan

TOKYO

Maruzen Company Ltd

All rights reserved

NATURAL LAW AND THE THEORY OF SOCIETY

1500 TO 1800

BY OTTO GIERKE

With a Lecture on The Ideas of Natural Law and Humanity
by ERNST TROELTSCH

TRANSLATED WITH AN INTRODUCTION

BY ERNEST BARKER

Professor of Political Science in the University of Cambridge

VOLUME II

CAMBRIDGE
AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS
1934

PRINTED IN GREAT BRITAIN

CONTENTS

VOLUME II

V

GIERKE'S NOTES

§ 14. The Natural-Law Conception of the State	229
§ 15. The Natural-Law Theory of Associations	269
§ 16. The General Theory of the Group in Natural Law	288
§ 17. The Natural-Law Theory of the State	333
§ 18. The Theory of Corporations in Natural Law	367

VI

LISTS OF AUTHORITIES

A. 1500-1650	401
B. 1650-1800	409

VII

INDEX	418
-------	-----

GIERKE'S NOTES

§14. THE NATURAL-LAW CONCEPTION OF
THE STATE

1. After the sketch given in my work on 'Johannes Althusius and the natural-law theories of the State', the only matter on which I need to go into detail here is the relation of the natural-law doctrine of the State to particular problems which are of special importance in the history of the theory of the Corporation; and for the rest I shall content myself with giving references to that work.... I have not worked through the large body of literature which has appeared since the completion of this subsection. But I may refer to the Addenda to the second and third editions of my work on Althusius for an account of my attitude to views differing from my own which have been put forward since I first wrote.

2. This is the case with J. Oldendorp (1480-1561), Jurus naturalis, gentium et civilis usus, Cologne, 1539 (Opera, 1, pp. 189-190); N. Hemming (1513-1600), De lege naturali apodeictica methodus, Wittenberg, 1552 (also printed in Kaltenborn, II, pp. 268-269); G. Obrecht, De justitia et iure, in Selectissimae disputationes, Strasburg, 1599, no. 1; B. Winkel (1579-1648), Principiorum iuriis libri V, Leipzig, 1615 (Kaltenborn, II, pp. 45-46); B. Meissner, De legibus, Wittenberg, 1616; John Selden (1584-1654), De iure naturali et gentium, iuxta disciplinam Ebraeorum, London, 1640. See also Bolognetus (1599-85), De lege, iure et aequitate, in Tract. Univ. Jur. 1, fol. 289-324.

*Early works on
Natural Law*

3. See Franciscus Victoria (Dominican, †1546), Selectiones tredecim, Ingolstadt, 1580; Dominicus Soto (Dominican, 1494-1560), De justitia et iure, Venice, 1602 (first published 1556); F. Vasquez (1509-66), Controversiarum illustrum altiarumque usu frequentium libri III, Frankfort on the Main, 1572; Gregorius de Valentia (Jesuit), Commentarii theologiae, Ingolstadt, 1592, II, Diss. 1; Balthasar Ayala (1548-84), De iure et officio belli, Antwerp, 1597; Ludovicus Molina (1535-1600), De justitia et iure tom. VI, Mainz, 1614 (and also in 1602); Leonhardus Lessius (Jesuit, 1554-1623), De justitia et iure libri IV, 3rd edition, Antwerp, 1612 (first published in 1606); Cardinal Robert Bellarmine (1542-1621), De potestate summi pontificis in rebus temporalibus, Cologne, 1611 (first published in 1610); Johannes de Lugo (Jesuit), De justitia et iure, ed. nova, Lyons, 1670.

*Ecclesiastical writers on
Natural Law*

4. F. Suarez (Jesuit, 1548-1617), Tractatus de legibus ac Deo legislatore, Antwerp, 1613 (first published in 1611).

5. Hugo Grotius, De iure belli ac pacis libri tres, 1625; the edition used by the author is that published at Amsterdam, 1702.

6. See Machiavelli (1469-1527), Il principe (first published in 1515), and the whole body of literature written about and against him.

Political writings on practical questions

See also the numerous 'Mirrors of Princes' and cognate writings, such as: G. Lauterbeck, Regenbuech, new edition, 1559; Osorius, De Regis institutione, Cologne, 1572; Waremund de Erenbergk (Eberhardt von Weyhe), Aulus-politicus, 1596; Hippolytus a Collibus, the Princeps (1592), and the Consiliarius, the Palatinus and the Nobilis, edited together, with additions, by Naurath, Frankfort, 1670, Mambrinus Rosacius, Institutio principis christiani, Strassburg, 1608, Tympe, Aureum speculum principum, Cologne, 1629 (first published in 1617); Georg Engelhardt von Löhneys, Hof-, Staats- und Regerkunst, 1622; Carolus Scribanus, Politico-Christianus, Münster, 1625; Ambrosius Marlianus, Theatrum politicum, Danzig, 1645; Saavedra Faxardo, Idea da uno principe Cristiano, 1649.

See also the writings on arcana republicae, such as: Clapmarus (1574-1604), De arcana rerum publicarum libri VI, Jena, 1665 (first published in 1605); G. Obrecht (1547-1612), Secreta politica, Strassburg, 1644 (previously published in 1617). In addition, we may cite. Oldendorp, Von Rathschlagen, wie man gute Polizey und Ordnung in Städten und Landen erhalten möge, Rostock, 1579; Ferrarius, De republica bene instituenda, Basle, 1556, translated into German by Abraham Saur, Frankfort, 1601; Melchior ab Ossa, Testamentum, Frankfort, 1609; Zech, Politicorum libri III, Cologne, 1600; Gentillet, Discours sur les moyens de bien gouverner, 1576; Jacobus Simananca, De republica libri IX, 3rd edition, Antwerp, 1574; Lipsius, Politicorum libri VI, Antwerp, 1604; Loys de Mayerne, La monarchie aristodémocratique, Paris, 1611; J. a Chokier de Surlet, Thesaurus politicorum aphorismorum, Cologne (many editions); Jean de Marnix, Résolutions politiques et maximes d'État, Rouen, 1624.

*Treatises on
raison d'état*

7. Botero, Della ragione di stato, Venice, 1559; Zinanus, De ratione optimae imperandi, Frankfort, 1628; W. Faber Effren, Manuale politicum de ratione status, Frankfort, 1630; Wangenbeck, Vindiciae politicae adversus pseudopoliticos, Dillingen, 1636. The work of Hippolitus a Lapide, De ratione status in imperio nostro Romano-Germanico, 1640, belongs in its general tone and treatment altogether to the purely political school, and makes the dictates of raison d'état superior to the requirements of Law, but in dealing with German conditions the author distinguishes sharply between (1) the analysis of the existing conditions (which is treated from a purely historicico-legal point of view in Part 1), and (2) political maxims (which are suggested in Parts II and III).*

8. Petrus Gregorius Tholosanus (1540-91), De republica, Frankfort, 1609 (first published in 1586).

Arnisaeus

9. H. Arnisaeus († 1636), Opera omnia politica, Strassburg, 1648. Among his writings may be specially noted: Doctrina politica in genuinam methodum quae est Aristotelis reducta (first published in 1606); De jure magistatus libri III (first published in 1610), De auctoritate principum in populum semper inviolabili (first published in 1611); De republica seu relectionis politicas libri II (first published in 1615).

10. H. Conring (1606-81), Opera, Brunswick, 1730, vol. III.

*Works on political theory not based on Natural
Law*

11. See B. J. Omphalus, De civili politia libri III, Cologne, 1565; Casus, Sphaera civitatis, Frankfort, 1589; Albergati, Discorsi politici, Venice (point by point against Bodin and for Aristotle), J. Stephanus, Demonstrations politorum, Greifswald, 1599; Melchior Junius, Politicorum quaestionum centuria et tredecim, Strassburg, 1631 (first published in 1602); J. Crüger, Collegium politicum, Giessen, 1609; H. Velstenius, Centuria quaestionum polituarum, Wittenberg, 1610; W. Helder, Systema philosophiae politicae, Jena, 1628 (1610), C. Matthias,

* Ratio status, or ratio administratio, in its original sense, is concerned with the ratio, in the sense of the general principles and the particular requirements, of a State and its government. This is the sense in which e.g. Althusius uses the phrase. The idea of raison d'état or Staatsraison is a later development. Cf. F. Meinecke, Die Idee der Staatsraison in der neueren Geschichte.

Collegium politicum, Gießen, 1611, Systema politicum, Gießen, 1618; C. Gnein-zus, Exercitationes politicae, Wittenberg, 1617-18, Diodorus of Tuldien († 1645), De regime civili libri VIII (in Opera, Louvain, 1702), Aaron Alexander Olizarovius, De politica hominum societate libri III, Danzig, 1651.

12. J. Bodin, De republika libri VI, ed. 2, Frankfort, 1591 (first French Bodin edition 1577, first Latin 1584) On the epoch-making importance of his theory, see the modern works mentioned in the author's work on Althusius, p. 351 n. 2. [See also J. W. Allen, Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century, Part III, c. viii.]

18. Among the writings of the so-called 'Monarchomachi' there are The Monarchomachi pamphlets both on the Protestant and on the Catholic side which equally advocate the cause of popular sovereignty.

(a) On the Protestant side, the work of Hotoman (1524-90), Francogallia, Frankfort, 1665 (first published at Geneva, 1573), has still mainly an historical basis. In the anonymous treatise [probably written by Beza, Calvin's successor in Geneva], De jure magistrorum in subditos et officio subditorum erga magistros, Magdeburg, 1578 (first published in French, and stated on the title-page to have been published at Lyons, 1576), the argument from Natural Law still plays a secondary part. Natural Law is the basis of argument in the following Stephanus Junius Brutus (the real author was H. Languet (1518-81), or according to others P. Duplessis-Mornay), Vindiciae contra Tyrannos, Paris, 1631 (first published at Edinburgh [the real place of publication was Basle] in 1579), George Buchanan (1506-82), De jure regni apud Scottos dialogus, 2nd edition, Edinburgh, 1580 (first published in 1579), Lambertus Danaeus, Politicæ Christianæ libri VII, 2nd edition, Paris, 1606 (first published in 1596), John Milton (1609-74), The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1648-9), Eikonoclastes, Defensio pro populo Anglicano (1651), Defensio secunda (1654), in his Prose Works, London, 1648 (ii, pp. 235sq., i, pp. 307sqq., 3sqq., and 216sqq.) [On the three Huguenot authors first cited by Gierke—Hotoman, Beza and Languet—see J. W. Allen, Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century; and on the authorship of the Vindiciae contra Tyrannos see E. Barker, in the Cambridge Historical Journal, 1931 and R. Patry, P. du Plessis-Mornay, pp. 275-82.]

(b) On the Catholic side there are the following: Marius Salamonius, De principatu libri VI, Paris, 1578 [originally published at Rome, in 1544, the writer seems to have been a Spaniard], Boucher, De justa Henrici III abdicatione et Francorum regno libri IV, Lyons, 1591; Guilielmus Rossaeus, De justa reipublicae Christianae in reges impios et haereticos auctoritate, Antwerp, 1592 (first published in 1590, with a preface dated 1589), Mariana, De rege et regis institutione, Frankfort, 1611 (first published at Toledo, 1599).

New works on the Monarchomachi are mentioned in the author's work on Althusius (especially Treumann, Rehm, Landmann and Gooch). See also A. Elkan, Die Publizisten der Bartholomäusnacht, Heidelberg, 1905 [a work valuable for its account of Hotoman, Beza and Duplessis-Mornay], F. Aigier, Essai sur l'histoire des doctrines du contrat social, Paris, 1906, pp. 100sqq. [Mention may also be made of G. Weil, Les Théories sur le pouvoir royal en France pendant les guerres de religion, G. de Lagarde, L'Esprit politique de la Réforme, A. Méaly, Les publicistes de la Réforme; J. N. Figgis, From Gerson to Grotius].

14. See G. Barclaius (1577-1608) [really 1543-1605], De regno et regali Advocates of potestate adversus Buchananum, Brutum [i.e. the author of the Vindiciae contra absolutismus Tyrannos], Boucherum et reliquos Monarchomachos libri VI, Hanover, 1612 (first published in 1600); T. J. F. Graswinckelius (1600-66), De jure majestatis, The Hague, 1642; Claudius Salmasius (1588-1653), Defensio regia pro Carolo I regis Angliae, Paris, 1651.

Althusius

15. Johannes Althusius (1557-1638), Politica methodice digesta atque exemplis sacris et profanis illustrata, 3rd edition, Herborn, 1614 (first published in 1603). [Recently reprinted, from the 3rd edition, with an introduction by C. F. Friedrich, Harvard University Press, 1932.]

*Political text-books after 1600,
based on
Natural Law*

16. See Otho Casmannus, Doctrinae et vitae politicas methodicum et breve sistema, Frankfort, 1603; B. Keckermann (1571-1609), Systema disciplinae politicae, Hanover, 1607; J. Bornitius, Partitionum politicarum libri IV, Hanover, 1607, De majestate politica, Leipzig, 1610, Aerarium, Frankfort, 1612, De rerum sufficientia in republica et civitate procuranda, Frankfort, 1625; H. Kirchner, Respublica, Marburg, 1608; Z. Fidenreich, Politicorum liber, Strassburg, 1609; J. H. Alstedius, De statu rerumpublicarum, Herborn, 1612, Busius, De republica libri III, Franeker, 1613; M. Z. Boxhornius († 1613), Institutionum politicarum libri II, 2nd edition, Leipzig, 1665; G. Schönborner (1579-1637), Politicorum liber VII, 4th edition, Frankfort, 1628 (first published in 1614; a second-hand work, based upon this, is the De statu politico seu civili libri VI published at Frankfort in 1617); P. H. Hoenonius (de Hoen, 1576-1640), Disputationum politicarum liber unus, 3rd edition, Herborn, 1615; M. Tortius, De natura iurum majestatis et regalium, in Arumaeus, 1 (1616), no. 2; König, Actes disputationum politicarum, Jena, 1619, Adam Contzen (Jesuit, 1573-1635), Politicorum libri X, Mainz, 1620, Claudius de Carnin, Malleus tripartitus, Antwerp, 1620, Menochius (Jesuit), Hieropolitica, 2nd edition, Cologne, 1626, Werdenhagen, Universalis introductio in omnes Respublicas, Amsterdam, 1632, C. Liebenthal, Collegium politicum, Marburg, 1644; N. Vermulacus, Diss. politicae, Louvain, 1646; Daniel Berckringer, Institutiones politicae sue de republica, Utrecht, 1662.

Hobbes

17. The reference is to Besold's Opus politicum, ed. nova, Strassburg, 1626.

18. Thomas Hobbes (1588-1679), Elementa philosophicae de civi, Amsterdam, 1647; Leviathan, seu de materia, forma et potestate civitatis ecclesiasticae et civili, Amsterdam, 1670 [in English, under the title of Leviathan, 1651]. On Hobbes see particularly F. Tonnies, Thomas Hobbes der Mann und der Denker, Leipzig, 1912. [See also A. Levi, La Filosofia di Tommaso Hobbes, Milan, 1929.]

19. Compare e.g. Schnedewein in Comm. on the Institutes, 1, 2, Mynsinger, Apotelesma on 1. 1 D. 1, 1; Rittershusius, Instit. 1, 2, pp. 25sqq.; Ostermann, Rationalia ad Instit. 1, 2.

20. Compare Cantiuncula, Instit. 1, 2; Vasquez, Controv. illustr. cc 7, 10 and 54; Hunnius, Comm. in Instit. 1, 2, Coll. Instit. Disp. 1, Var. resol. jur. civ. 1, 1, qu. 19sqq.; Bunnus, Comm. in Instit. 1, 2; Sylv. Aldobrandinus, In primum Instit. Just. librum Comm. (Venice, 1567), J. F. Ozerius, Comm. in libros Instit. (Venice, 1562), pp. 37-8; Bachoven ab Echt, Comm. in Instit. 1, 2, pp. 9sqq., Pandect. pp. 16sqq., V. W. Forster, Tract. Disp. 1; P. Busius, on 1. 1 D. 1, 1; J. Harprecht, Instit. 1, 2; Wurmser, Exerc. III, qu. 1; T. Schuminus, In I. libr. Instit. Just. catholicae explicatio, Brussels, 1663, 1, 2.

21. Compare Connamus, Comm. iur. civ. 1, cc. 1-7; Melchior Kling, Instit. 1, 2; Vigilius, Decisiones juris controv. IV, no. 6; Faber, Jurispr. Papri 1, 2, pp. 31-57, Rationalia, 1, 1-4; A. Matthaeus, Comm. in Instit. 1, 2; Ludwell, Comm. in Instit. 1, 2; Schambogen, Lect. publ. in Instit. 1, 2, qu. 1-7, G. Frantzke, Comm. in Instit. 1, 2; Lauterbach, Coll. 1, 1, §§ 22sqq. Compare also Duarenus, 1, 1, c. 5; Cujacius, 1, pp. 9sqq., vn, pp. 14sqq.; Diodorus Tuldenus, Comm. in Institut. 1, 2; Petrus Lagneus, Annot. ad Institut. 1, 2; H. Giphanius, Instit. 1, 2; Cothmann, Disp. 1, thes. 4-12, Instit. 1, 2, Cod. 1, 14.

22. More particularly, we find Ulpian's dictum about the participation of animals in Natural Law disputed, or explained as an unauthoritative mode of expression; and this leads to a rejection of the hitherto generally accepted doctrine that jus naturale (or jus naturale primorum) is a law common to men and animals, while jus gentium is to be regarded as a law peculiar to men. On this basis the difference between jus naturale and jus gentium was explained simply by reference to the distinction between the 'absolute' and the 'conditioned' dictates of reason, or, again, between 'original' knowledge of the law of Reason and the knowledge which is 'acquired' in the course of historical development. See Corasius, on l. 1, § 2, D. 1, 11; Connarus, loc. cit.; Forster, op. cit. no. 30, Bachoven von Echt, op. cit. p. 11; Ludwell, loc. cit.

23. See especially Connarus, Comm. iur. cw. 1, c. 4. Compare also Boxhorn, 1, c. 2, §§ 3-8, c. 3, §§ 15sqq., and the Commentary of an ex-professor of Jena on the Codex, 1, 1-13, in G. A. Struvius, Jus sacrum Justin., Jena, 1668, Prooemium.

24. See Hotoman, Instit. 1, 2, pr., Vultejus, loc. cit., Giphanius, loc. cit.; Forster, Tract. Disp. 1, no. 29, Wurmser, Exerc. 1, qu. 3 (jus publicum ex praecceptis naturalibus, gentium et civilibus collectum est)

25. Thinkers who maintained the theory that only a condition of universal liberty and community of property corresponded to pure Natural Law, and that government and property first came into the world through the corruption of human nature and the breach with pure Natural Law which was thereby involved, are sometimes found declaring the State itself to be a creation of jus gentium. See e.g. Lessius, II, c. 5, dub. 1-3; Molina, II, d. 18, § 17 and d. 20; Gryphiander, De civili soc. §§ 60sqq. But the jus gentium of which they spoke was for them identical with Natural Law, in the only form in which it could be applied to the real world.

26. Melchior Kling (Instit. 1, 2, folio 1 verso) remarks in general terms that philosophers, in contradistinction to jurists, generally identify jus naturale with jus gentium. This is correct; for while Oldendorp (op. cit. tit. 2-4) and Hemming both use the threefold division [of natural law, jus gentium and positive law], the later legal philosophers generally assume as their basis a simple distinction between natural and positive law. This is the case with Winkler (II, cc. 9-10), though he proceeds to divide jus naturale into (a) jus naturale prius (III, c. 1sq.) and (b) jus naturale posteriorius, i.e. gentium jus (IV, c. 1sq.), and to contrast both with jus positivum seu civile (V, c. 1sq.). See also Beneckendorf, Repetitio et explicatio de regulis iuris, Frankfort on the Oder, 1593, pp. 81sqq.

The ecclesiastical legal philosophers almost always start from the antithesis of lex naturalis and lex positiva. But along with the former, they postulate the existence of lex aeterna or divina, which they rank as superior to or co-ordinate with it; and in the same way [as they distinguish two 'ideal' laws] they proceed to divide lex positiva into jus humanum [positive secular law] and jus divinum positivum [positive revealed law]: cf. Soto, lib. I and II; Gregorius de Valentia, qu. 3-8; Bolognetus, cc. 3-7, Suarez, lib. II-IV. We find a similar view in Mciszner, lib. II-IV.

Among the jurists we may note Donellus, who (I, c. 6) recognises only two

Natural Law and Jus gentium

The State as product of Jus gentium

Distinction of Natural and Positive Law, with Jus gentium disappearing legislators—natura seu naturalis ratio (and God as immanent in it), and potestas curia. He accordingly identifies jus gentium and jus naturale, inasmuch as all jus gentium is simply natura constitutum (§§ 4–5), and, conversely, all jus naturale referring to mankind manifests itself as jus gentium (§§ 6–9). In the same sense Vultejus remarks (Comm. in Institut 1, 2, pp. 12–41) that the threefold division is really only a twofold division into jus naturale and jus civile—jus gentium being only a species of the former. The same idea is expressed even more definitely by Althusius of Ducenologia, 1, cc. 13–14 (and more particularly, as regards jus gentium, c. 13, nos. 18–20). Compare Salomonius, In libr Pand. ius. civl. Commentatio, Basle, 1530, l. 1 D. 1, 1, fol. 6sqq., Corasius on l. 1 D. 1, 1, Stryck, Annotationes to Lauterbach, Coll. 1, 1, p. 15. Political writers almost always use the simple distinction of natural and positive law.

*Tendency to neglect
Jus gentium*

27. This [i.e. neglect of jus gentium, even though it is allowed to be one of the forms of law] is what we find in Bodin. In Book 1, c. 8, no. 107 he confines the absolute obligatory force of jus gentium to the cases in which it is in agreement with jus naturale. It also appears in Soto (who never touches on jus gentium until he reaches Book III, c. 1), Suarez (Book II), and other ecclesiastical legal philosophers. We find it even in the writers who seek to distinguish the natural-law from the positive-law elements in jus gentium, such as Molina (v, d. 69), Lessius (II, c. 2), and more especially Vasquez (cc. 27 and 51).

Grotius (I, c. 1, §§ 10–17) definitely assumes a simple bipartite division of law. Law is either jus naturale, resting on the dictamen rectae rationis, or jus voluntariorum, depending on legislative will, and the latter is either humanum or divinum. As for jus gentium, it is a species of jus humanum voluntariorum, it is the agreement of positive law as between all or a number of peoples; the Roman conception of jus gentium naturale has hardly any value (§ 11), natural law and positive law are confused in the Roman jus gentium (II, c. 8, § 26).

28. It is only in this sense that we find jus gentium occurring in Hobbes.

29. The ecclesiastical legal philosophers are particularly insistent in holding (1) on the one hand, that the union of men in a vita socialis, the institution of the original sovereignty of the community over individuals, and the devolution of authority on a secular government, are all derived from jus naturale and therefore from God, and cannot be changed even by the consensus totius orbis, and (2) on the other hand, that the various constitutional forms have their basis in jus humanum. Cf. Soto, IV, qu. 4, art. 1; F. Victoria, Rel. III, nos. 1–8, Bellarmine, De laicis, cc. 5–6, Rossaeus, c. 1, §§ 1–3, Molina, II, disp. 22, 23, 26–7; Suarez, III, cc. 1–5; Claudio de Carnini, I, cc. 6 and 9–10. The same view is expressed by Arnaeaus, Polit. c. 2, De rep. c. 1, §§ 1–4, De auctor princ. c. 3. The basis of the State and its authority in pure Natural Law is assumed as self-evident by most of the champions of popular sovereignty: cf. Buchanan, pp. 11–13, [Benza's] De jure magistr. p. 4, qu. 6, p. 75, Danacus, I, cc. 3–4; Althusius, c. 1, §§ 32–9, Milton, the Defensio of 1651, cc. 2–3 and 5. The absolutists are, however, no less definite in their appeal to divine and Natural Law: cf. Graaßwinkel, c. 15sqq.; Salmasius, cc. 2–3 and 5–6. Further details are given in the author's work on Althusius, pp. 65–8, 72 n. 41, 93 n. 48.

30. See vol. III of the author's Das deutsche Genossenschaftsrecht, pp. 611sqq. [translated in The Political Theories of the Middle Age, pp. 75sqq.] and his work on Althusius, pp. 279sqq. and 365.

31. In particular, this idea [of a sacrosanct sphere of natural rights] served to decide questions such as the obligatory force of constitutional laws,

*The State
based on pure Natural Law*

*Natural
Rights*

the right of resistance (passive or active), and the rights of a people against a ruler who transgressed the bounds of his authority: cf. the author's work on Althusius, pp. 305sqq. 365 n. 95

82. We find legal philosophers and political writers energetically developing and applying the old theories, (1) that Natural Law, as the dictamen rectae rationis, was unalterable by any human power and even by God Himself, (2) that all positive law was derived from it, and could only add to or take away from it when place and time might require, and (3) that an enactment contrary to Natural Law was entirely null and void, and, per contra, an enactment was the more perfect, the more nearly it approached the Law of Nature. Cf. e.g. Soto, I, qu. 4; Vasquez, c. 27; Gregorius de Valentia, II, d. 1, qu. 4, Bolognetus, c. 7; Molina, v, d. 68; Winkler, II, cc. 9-10, v, c. 1sq., [Beza's] De jure magistr. sect. 4, qu. 2-3, Beneckendorf, op. cit. pp. 81sqq.; Vultejus, Instit. I, 2, pp. 37-44; Bodin, I, c. 8, no. 107 and II, c. 2; Althusius, Dicaeologia, I, c. 13, no. 9sqq. and c. 14, Polit. Praef and c. 128 [2 c. xxxviii], §§ 128-9.

Natural Law as a political standard

Many writers (e.g. Hotoman, Instit. I, c. 2, pr.; Bachoven, Instit. I, 2, § 1; and Winkler, v, c. 1) divided jus civile into mixtum and merum, according as Natural Law was or was not included in it; but others contested even the bare possibility of a purely positive law: cf. Althusius, Dicaeologia, I, c. 14 (a law completely agreeing with Natural Law would not be civile, but a law with no element of Natural Law would not be jus at all), Ludwell, Instit. I, 2, § 1.

83. Vultejus (Instit. I, 2, § 11, p. 41 no. 6) expresses this idea in a particularly definite way: jus naturale est in seipso in recta ratione firmum et immutabile... iterum est immutabile in totum, a quo interdum paulatim receditur, ut ad ipsum redendi via sit commodior, ne, si directe ad ipsum eatur, ad ipsum non perveniat.

84. See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 63sqq. and 338.

85. Bodin, I, c. 1, no. 1, gives the definition, Respublica est familiarum rerumque inter ipsas communium summa potestate ac ratione moderata multitudo. The definition of Gregorius (I, I, § 6) is more detailed: Respublica est rerum et vitae quaedam communias unius societas, quae efficit unum quoddam corpus civile ex pluribus diversis ut membris compositum, sub una potestate suprema veluti sub uno capite et uno spiritu, ad bene et commodius vivendum in hac mortali vita, utque facilis ad aeternam perveniat. Cf. also Althusius, Polit. c. 9; Hoenomus, I, § 3; Kirchner, I, § 3; Keckermann, Praecon. p. 7; Konig, Theatrum pol. I, c. 1; Winkler, v, c. 4; Suarez, m, c. 1; Grotius, II, c. 9, § 3; cf. I, c. 3, §§ 4-6, II, c. 15, § 3, III, c. 20, §§ 2-4; Berckringer, I, c. 4; Boxhorn, I, c. 2, § 1.

*Respublica
and Civitas*

Often a distinction is drawn between Civitas and Respublica, which are said to be related as materia and forma, or as subjectum and actus, or as body and soul. The Civitas thus becomes merely the group or community which is the basis of the State, while the Respublica is the constitution of that group; and on this basis the Civitas is defined as a body of persons, and the Respublica as an order of relations (an ordo iubendi ac parendi, or some such phrase)—the idea of societas being then connected with the former, and that of summa potestas with the latter. The distinction is particularly emphasised in Arnisaeus, Polit. cc. 6 and 7, De rep. I prooem. §§ 4sqq., I, c. 5, s. 3, II, c. 1, s. 1; see also Besold, Princ. et finis pol. doctr. Diss. I, c. 5, §§ 1-3 and c. 8; Knipschmidt, De Civ. imp. I, c. 1; Schönbörner, I, c. 4; Werdenhagen, II, cc. 1 and 3; Berckringer, cc. 1 and 4.

86. Althusius expressly makes the chief task of politics consist in the of the nature and authority of majestas; cf. his prefaces (in the author's work on Althusius, pp. 18-20).

Sovereignty

87. On the history of the conception of sovereignty see the author's work on Althusius, Part II, c. v and pp. 351sqq., with the works there cited by Hancke, Weill, Dunning, Dock, Merriam, Rehm and Jellinek; and also Preuss, Gemeinde, Staat, Reich als Gebietskörperschaften (Berlin, 1889), pp. 106sqq. [See also the exhaustive analysis of the conception in de la Bigne de Villeneuve, Traité général de l'État, vol. 1.]

88. References for all these points may be found in the author's work on Althusius, pp. 151-8, 163-78 and 351sqq. [Gierke also refers to the notes on pp. 213-15, 218-19 and 220-3 of the fourth volume of his Genossenschaftsrecht, in a section not here translated.]

89. See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 143sqq.

Classification of States

40. The classification of forms of the State of course assumed a far greater importance when the Ruler was the 'Subject' or owner of Sovereignty than when he only exercised a sovereignty which always and everywhere belonged to the People; and indeed a strict interpretation of popular sovereignty reduced the classification of forms of the State into a mere classification of forms of government. Althusius was the first to express this consequence definitely; and he deals with classification only at the end of his Politica (c. 39), in expounding a theory of the species sumum magistratus see the author's work on Althusius, p. 35; and see also Buchanan, p. 20, and Milton, The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates.

The mixed Constitution: opponents and advocates

41. This explains why we find opponents of the conception of the forma mixta not only among (1) the advocates of the sovereignty of the Ruler, but also among (2) the devotees of popular sovereignty and (3) those of 'double sovereignty'. The opponents of the first kind are e.g. Bodin, II, c. 1, nos. 174-8, c. 7, no. 234; Gregorius, V, c. 1, §3; Barclay, V, c. 12; Bornitus, Part. pp. 46sqq. and 102sqq.; Reinkungk, I, cl. 2, c. 2, nos. 231sqq. and cl. 5, c. 6; Graswinkel, c. 6; Hobbes, De cive, c. 7; Leviathan, c. 19. The opponents of the second kind are Althusius, c. 39; Hoenius, II, §42. Opponents of the third kind are Kirchner, III, §7, litt. e; Alsted, pp. 69sqq.; Arumaeus, I, no. 1; Otto, Diss. an mixtus detin republiecae status; in Arumaeus, II, no. 22; Brautlauch, III, c. 2, §10; Cubach, Beindorff, Hilliger, Konings, Schieferer. [Gierke also refers to a note on p. 219 of the fourth volume of the Genossenschaftsrecht, in a section not here translated.] Conversely, the mixed form receives the adhesion not only (1) of some of the advocates of popular sovereignty (such as Hotman, Francogallia, c. 12, and Danaeus, I, c. 6), and (2) of advocates of 'double sovereignty' (e.g. Besold, De statu resp. mixtae, c. 2; Frantzken, De statu resp. mixtae, in Arumaeus, III, no. 27 and IV, no. 41, §§60sqq.; Tuldien, II, cc. 16-17; Berckringer, I, c. 12, §§15-21; Werdenhagen, II, c. 25; Liebenthal, d. VIII, qu. 1; Paurmeister; Linnaeus, Carpzov) [Gierke also refers to pp. 218sqq. of the fourth volume of the Genossenschaftsrecht, in a section not here translated]; but also (3) of many of the advocates of the sovereignty of the Ruler. Examples of this last class are Molina, II, diss. 23; Suarez, III, c. 4, no. 5 and c. 19, no. 6, IV, c. 17, no. 4; Albergati, I, cc. 8sqq., pp. 251sqq.; Arumaeus, Polit. c. 8, De iure mag. II, cc. 1 and 6; De rep. II, c. 6, s. 1 and s. 5 §§1-134, II, c. 1, §1, De act. c. 1, §§4sqq.; Busius, II, c. 6, Knipschildt, I, c. 8, nos. 61-3; Keckermann, II, cc. 4-6; Heider, pp. 982sqq.; Schonborner, I, c. 16; Fclwinger, Diss. pp. 147-84 [a reference is also added to other writers cited in a note on

p. 222 of the fourth volume of the Genossenschaftsrecht]. A similar view occurs in Grotius, I, c. 3, §§ 17–20, c. 4, § 13.

It should be added, however, that the conception of the mixed constitution has obviously a different significance, according as the right of the Ruler which is held to be divisible among a number of different 'Subjects' is regarded as (a) the one and only form of Sovereignty, or (b) merely a majestas personalis, or (c) a simple 'magistracy'.

42. Cf. Bodin, II, c. 1, F. Victoria, Rel. III, no. 10 (there is the same potestas and the same libertas in every form of State, whether unus or plures be the 'Subject' of sovereignty); Grazwinckel, c. 11 (whether the ruling authority be persona unum or corpore unum);* the same theory is applicable in regard to imperium and obedientia, and their origo a Deo); Arniaceus, Polit. c. 11, De iure mag. I, c. 2, De rep. II, c. 7, n. 2; Claudio de Carnin, I, c. 10; Hobbes, De cive, c. 7, §§ 7 and 9, c. 10, Leviathan, cc. 18–19.

Those who maintained, in regard to monarchy, the principle that the king was superior not only to all the members of the community as individuals, but also to the community itself as a whole, were logically compelled to admit the corresponding principle in regard to democracy—that the governing community of the People was superior not only to individuals, but also to the whole body of the governed. In doing so, they allowed the conception of the sovereign Whole to transform itself into that of the majority [i.e. they regarded the majority, rather than the whole community of the people, as superior to the body of the governed]; but failure to analyse their conceptions adequately enabled them to avoid the paradoxical conclusion, which this involved, that the majority had a greater authority than all the members taken together. Thus we find Bodin saying of the populare status (II, c. 7), Cives universi, aut maxima pars eorum, caeteris omnibus non tantum singulatim, sed etiam simul coacervatis et collectis, imperandi jus habent. Other thinkers, in dealing with democracy, tacitly dropped the distinction between the sovereign community and the whole body of the governed [or, as Rousseau expressed it, between the people as souverain and the people as état], and simply spoke of the authority of the populus universus over omnes ut singuli. Bornutius (Part. p. 51) expressly remarks that in a democracy the sovereign cives, collective sunt, only govern singuli, for cunctis non possunt [imperare]. Hobbes was the first thinker who was able, without self-contradiction, to reject the view that in a democracy there was a personality of the people [as a governed body] which was distinct from the collective person of the people as Ruler, and he was able to do so because, in every form of State, he regarded the people as being, in relation to the Ruler, a mere sum of 'dissolute' individuals (cf. De cive, c. 6, §§ 13 and 17, c. 7, §§ 5–7, c. 12, § 8, Leviathan, c. 18).

43. Thus Besold (De mag. 8, I, c. 1, § 5) ascribes to the popular assembly in a democracy, acting by majority-vote, only a majestas personalis, while he assigns to the community of the citizens a majestas realis, and he consequently draws the conclusion that unanimity is required for constitutional changes and for any regulations which relate to the State itself. Diodorus of Tuleden (I, cc. 11 and 12) takes the same line. The advocates of a 'double sovereignty', who distinguished between majestas realis and personalis even in treating of democracy, were theoretically bound to assume two different forms of

*The ab-
solutil view of democracy, as equally absolute with monarchy*

*The problem of
the People as Ruler and the People
as ruled*

* Persona unum — one in the sense of possessing a single legal personality (though several physical persons may unite to constitute that single personality). corpo-rum unum — one in the sense of being a single physical person.

sovereign community of the People. Similarly, too, in the pure theory of popular sovereignty, the sovereign People [which is ultimately supreme in all forms of State] cannot be logically identified with the People which is instituted as the Ruling authority in a democracy. Even the advocates of the sovereignty of the Ruler, if they pushed the doctrine of a contract of submission [i.e. of a contract of government] to its logical conclusion, were bound to distinguish, as the two separate parties involved in that contract when a democracy was in question, (1) the originally sovereign People, and (2) the sovereign popular assembly deciding by majority-vote [to which the originally sovereign People had submitted itself by contract]: cf. Victoria, III, nos. 1, 6-8, Soto, IV, qu. 1, a 1, Molina, II, d. 23, § 12, Fradenreich, c. 18.

It was impossible, however, to take these distinctions seriously without being involved in contradictions. Thinkers began by arguing, where other forms of State than democracy were concerned, that both the original rights of the People and those of its rights which still remained in action after the institution of the Ruler belonged to the same assembly—the assembly of all the members of the State—deciding as a universitas by majority-vote. Then, as soon as democracy was in question, they made a sudden volte-face, and required unanimity [i.e. they claimed that the sovereign People, when exercising its original rights, must be unanimous, though they allowed that the popular assembly, when exercising the rights which it acquired by being instituted as Ruler, might decide by majority-vote] This was an entirely arbitrary procedure; and yet without it the distinction of the two forms of the popular community remained without any practical significance. Many thinkers, accordingly, dropped any idea of a contract of submission [between the sovereign People and the popular assembly] in dealing with democracy, and substituted for it a special resolution of the sovereign People to retain its sovereignty thus is the line taken by Suarez, III, c. 4, nos. 1, 5-6, 11. Others, again, substituted [in lieu of a contract between the sovereign People and the popular assembly] a contract between the People and the governing body of the Republic, thereby abolishing any clear logical distinction between a Monarchy and a Republic. This is the line taken by Althusius (c. 39) while describing the People as itself the summus magistratus in a democracy, he nevertheless assumes a contractual relation between the People and its officials and ephors, cf. Rossaeus, c. 1, § 2, and Milton, Defensio of 1651, c. 6. The majority of thinkers were altogether silent on this difficult question. Hobbes, however (loc. cit.), saw clearly this weak spot in the armour of the doctrine of popular rights, and he used the inherent self-contradiction of the view that in a democracy the People must be superior to the People in order to refute entirely the idea that a popular community, as distinct from its Ruler, could have any sovereignty at all, whether in the way of original rights or of rights that still remained in action after the Ruler's institution.

44. See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 143sqq. and 356.

45. Op. cit. pp. 85, 91 and 341.

46. In this connection the three basic forms of government distinguished by Aristotle [the One, the Few and the Many] continued to be generally recognised; but there was an increasing tendency to unite with Aristotle's threefold division a logical distinction of governments into the two forms of Monarchy and the Republic—aristocracy and democracy being then taken together as forms of State with a collective government [i.e. government by more than One]. Cf. Althusius, c. 39, Victoria, Rel. iii, no. 10 (unus vel plures); Bornitus, Part. p. 45 (majestas nest uno semper r̄p λόγῳ, interdum etiam persona, interdum multis)*; Keckermann, Polit. ii, c. 1, Arnisaeus, De jure maj. i, c. 2, Polit. c. 11 (the sovereignty is unum either natura, or conspiratio et analogia); Grotius, i, c. 3, §7 (persona una pluresve), Busius, i, c. 3, §4 (unus vel plures); Berckinger, i, c. 4, §10 (unum numero vel analogia), Graszwinkel, c. 11 (persona unum or corpore unum), Hobbes, De cive, c. 5, §7 and c. 7, Leviathan, c. 17 (unus homo vel coetus). Althusius, Bornitus, Keckermann, Besold (De Arist. c. 1), Tuldén (n, c. 12) and other writers use the technical expressions 'Monarchy' and 'Polyarchy'.

47. The believers in a mixed constitution regarded a division of the right of government as possible; and conversely the indivisibility of governing authority served their opponents as the chief ground for rejecting such a form of State. Both allowed that other 'Subjects' (and, more particularly, assemblies of the Estates in a monarchy) might participate to some degree in the exercise of the right of government. But believers in the mixed constitution—assuming that States in which the right of government was constitutionally limited could co-exist with absolute States—asserted the possibility of an independent right to participate in the exercise of State-authority, while their opponents—refusing to allow any binding force to a constitutional limitation of the Ruler—treated any modification of governing authority by the co-operation of other factors as only a variation within the mode of government (ratus gubernandi or forma gubernandi).

Most of the advocates of the mixed form (cf. supra, n. 41) recognised in addition the merely 'limited' form of government (e.g. Molina, ii, d. 23, Suarez, iii, c. 4, no. 5, c. 9, no. 4, iv, c. 17, no. 4, Keckermann, i, c. 33, ii, cc. 4–6, Heider, pp. 982sqq., Busius, ii, cc. 6–7, Grotius, i, c. 3, §§16–18), but there were some of them who thought that while division of sovereignty was conceivable, limitation was not (Arnisaeus, De jure maj. i, c. 6, De rep. ii, c. 2, s. 5). Even the opponents of the mixed constitution (supra, n. 41)—not only those who advocate popular sovereignty and 'double sovereignty', but also many of those who advocate the sovereignty of the Ruler—are willing to accept the idea of limited government, and to defend, in so many words, the inviolability of constitutional limitations on the right of the Ruler (Bornitus, Part. 43, De maj. c. 13, Fritzenreich, cc. 18 and 29). On the other hand the thorough-going absolutists reject the limited form no less than the mixed (Bodin, i, c. 8, nos. 85–99, Gregorius, i, c. 1, §9, xxiv, c. 7; Barclay, Graszwinkel, cc. 3, 4, 6, 11, Hobbes, Salmasius, c. 7).

48. Cf. the author's Althusius, pp. 80sqq. and 341. The fact that Arnisaeus (op. cit. p. 81 n. 19) and Grotius (op. cit. n. 20) recognise other grounds [in addition to delegation by the people] for the acquisition of the rights of government, or again that Graszwinkel (c. 2) rejects the contract of government altogether, hardly weighs in the balance against the general trend of Contractarian theory.

49. Op. cit. p. 85, n. 30.

50. Op. cit. p. 85 n. 32.

51. The identity of the people as it now stands with the people as it originally existed was used to explain why a contract of government assigned to a primitive past was obligatory upon the present generation. In defence

* "The 'Subject' of Sovereignty is always theoretically one, sometimes it may also actually be one person, but sometimes it may be composed of many."

Mixed and limited constitutions

The People identical through the generations of its life of this identity we find an appeal expressly made to the principles of the [Roman-law] theory of Corporations in regard to the continuous existence of the universitas through all the changes of its members. cf. especially Junius Brutus [the author of the Vindictas contra Tyrannos], qu. III, pp. 171sqq.; but cf. also Althusius, c. 19, §§ 74sqq., c. 9, § 16, c. 38, §§ 65sqq., and Victoria, Rel. III, no. 11. Grotius uses the same idea (II, c. 5, § 31), extending it to cover cases of the forfeiture of imperium by delict or in war—qua successio partum non impedit quoniam unus sit populus; cf. also III, c. 9, § 9.

*The People
as a Corporate
Body*

52. According to the Vindictas contra Tyrannos the people, as a universitas which unius personae vicem sustinet, (1) acting in conjunction with the King, concludes a covenant with God (qu. II, p. 75), and (2) acting by itself, concludes a covenant with the King (qu. III, pp. 131sqq. and 248sqq.). Now since universitas nunquam moritur, and no prescription runs against it (qu. III, pp. 170-1), the people continues to possess inviolable rights and duties in virtue of both these covenants. (1) It is responsible to God, as correus debendi [or joint debtor] with the King, for the well-being of the Church, and it makes itself liable to divine punishment by tolerating godless magistrates, while according to the rule quod universitas debet, singulis non debent, the primates of the people ex foedere cum Deo non tenentur (qu. II, pp. 76, 84sqq. and 115). (2) Again, in regard to the King, the people, as a universitas, has a higher authority, and in the event of his becoming a tyrant it has the right and duty of resistance and deposition (qu. III, pp. 143sqq. and 292sqq.), while singulis privatis are in no way called upon to take such action (ibid. pp. 319sqq.).

Althusius brings the popular community, as a consociatio publica universalis, entirely under the category of the universitas (Polit. c. 9sqq.). He ascribes to this corpus consociatum—the totum corpus consociatum, or universitas populi—inalienable sovereignty, the ownership of State-property, and the rights belonging to an employer in regard to all officers vested with public powers of administration, while, citing in justification the [Roman-law] theory of corporations, he excludes individuals from the enjoyment of all these rights (Praef. pp. 9, 17, 18, 19, 38). See also Buchanan, pp. 16sqq. and 78; Hotoman, Francogallia, cc. 6-9 and 19; Rossacus, c. 1, §§ 2-3; Mariana, I, c. 8, Marinus Salamonius, De princ. I, pp. 19-20.

53. See, for example, Paumgäster, I, c. 17, Bortius, c. 6, § 2; Besold, De maj. sect. I, c. 1, § 4 (corpus) and § 7 (penes universitatem populi); Lumnæus, Cap. imp. p. 352.

54. Grotius employs the conception of the universitas and the principles of the [Roman-law] theory of corporations (1) in dealing with the contractual devolution or transference of supreme authority by the people (I, c. 3, § 13; II, c. 5, § 31, c. 14, §§ 2 and 10; III, c. 8), (2) in his account of delicts of the people and its responsibility for the delicts of its members (II, c. 21), (3) in regard to the question of the obligation of the people by the acts of the king (II, c. 14, § 10), (4) in justifying reprisals under international law (III, c. 2) and the taking of prizes (III, c. 6, § 8), and also in other respects.

55. See Victoria, III, no. 8, Vasquez, c. 47; Soto, IV, qu. 4, a. 1-2 (the people as corpus), Molina, II, disp. 23, Suarez, III, cc. 2-3 (the people as communitas, corpus mysticum, corpus politicum, originally possesses and transfers the supreme authority). See also Pruckmann, pp. 90sqq. (contract with the universitas or communitas), p. 111, nos. 25sqq.; Boxhorn, I, c. 2, § 1 (corpus militorum); Busius, I, c. 3, § 3 (universitas cuiuscunq; totius legitimæ civitatis uno imperio contentas).

*The use of the theory of Corporations
in Grotius*

And in ecclesiastical writers

56. See Bodin, I, c. 8, nos. 85-99, Gregorius, I, I, §§6-7 (unum corpus civile according to I, 30, D, 41, 3 and I, 1, §1, D, 3, 4); Knupachildt, V, c. 1, nos. 3-4

57. The people united in a State is described as a societas civilis, naturally developed by the extension and perfection of the Family, in the following writers: Gregorius, I, c. 1, §6 and c. 2, §§1-6 (societas, quae natura coacta), xix, c. un; Arnisaeus, De rep. I, c. 5, s. 4 and s. 5, Polit. c. 6 (the civitas is a societas, the civis is a socius); Besold, Diss. I, c. 3 (societas civilis, which in utero naturae concepta, in ejus gremio nutrita est), Kirchner, Diss. I, §3 (societas populi, legitimus civili potestatus imperio coacta); Keckermann, pp. 128sqq., Fridenreich, c. 2 (growth from consociationes domesticae, like a many-branched tree from its roots) and c. 10; Schonborner, I, c. 4, Cruger, Diss. I, Heider, pp. 25sqq., Werdenhagen, II, cc. 1-3 (the populus is a societas civilis); Tuldien, I, c. 5 (societas civilis, which arose ex naturae instruere), and c. 6 (the fines reipublicae is societas civilis tutela atque cultura), Conring (societas civilis, with imperium), Knupachildt, I, cc. 1 and 6, and many other writers.

A societas civilis founded by a union of men originally living in isolation is the basis adopted by Buchanan, pp. 115sqq., Mariana, I, c. 1, Rossacus, c. 1, §1, Boucher, cc. 10sqq., Hoenonius, I, §§4sqq., Winkler, I, c. 10, II, cc. 9-10, V, c. 3 (multitudo sese consociat, and thus produces societas civilis), cf. the description of the State as societas civili et voluntaria in Velstenuis, de 2-5, and in Matthias, Coll. disp. 4-5 and Syst. pp. 205sqq. The treatment of the community of the people as a contractually created 'society' is carried into greater detail by Salamonius, I, pp. 35sqq. and 38-42, and by Paurmeister, I, c. 17, nos. 3sqq. (the societas formed by mutua convenio), c. 3, no. 10 (societas et libera convenio), c. 30, nos. 1-3 (the ending of such societas by contraria voluntas).

Althusius, who is the first to develop a formal theory of the social contract as constituting the State, interprets the State throughout (like all other corporate bodies) as a consociatio or societas (Polit. cc. 1-9, Dicaeolog. I, c. 8, 32, 78 and 81). Grotius constantly applies the conception of consociatio or societas to the political community (Proleg. cc. 15-16, I, c. 1, §14, II, c. 5, §§17, 23, 24, II, c. 6, §§24-30, III, c. 2, §6, c. 20, §§7-8).

58. Cf. the author's Althusius, p. 94 n. 51, p. 96 n. 59, p. 98 n. 63, p. 100 n. 68. Schonborner, I, c. 4, definitely says, Essentia reipublicae est in personis vel imperantibus vel obtemperantibus, sibi invicem mutuus officiis obstrictis.

59. Cf. the author's Althusius, pp. 96sqq.

60. Thus, according to Mohna (II, d. 22, §§8-9), societas politica arises from the union of originally independent individuals, but because the natural reason given by God impels them thereto, there results eo ipso, quod homines ad integrandum unum corpus Republicae conveniunt, iure naturali, et sic a Deo immediate, potestas corporis totius Republicae in singulis partibus, ad eas gubernandum, ad leges illis ferendum jusque illis dicendum, et ad eas puniendum. The homines convenientes, because they are partes, are a comitudo sine qua non of the authority thus resulting, but they are not its creators otherwise it would be impossible to explain why the community has a right of life and death, while no individual has such a right over himself. Moreover, longe diversa sit potestas, quae ex natura res consurgit in Republica, a collectione particularium potestatum singulorum, and a Respublica does not hold its power *uctoritate singulorum, sed immediate a Deo.

* The theory of the theologians may be illustrated from the analogy of marriage. The agreement of husband and wife is necessary to the existence of marriage. But

The People described as a societas

The theory of the Rights of the People in the theologians

Suarez (iii, cc. 1-3) argues still more emphatically that, inasmuch as man is born free and subject to no human power, the perfecta communitas only arises in consequence of the interventus humanae voluntatis, and indeed per voluntatem omnium qui in illa convenerent, but at the same time, man being by nature subiungibilis, this agreement of union corresponds in his case to the demands of natural reason. Moreover, although the community itself coalescit medio consensu et voluntate singulorum, the authority which it possesses is not acquired directly from the singuli, who did not previously possess any such power, and least of all any right of life and death, nor is such authority acquired directly from God; it is derived ex vi rationis naturalis, as a proprietas consequens naturae which God has willed, and therefore it follows that individuals, though they are creators of the corpus politicum, are not the source of the authority of that body over itself and its members.

See also Didacus Covarruvias, Pract. qu. 1, cc. 1 and 4 (societas cuiuslibet is formed lege naturali, and by the same law it possesses all authority, which it proceeds to devolve upon a ruler) Soto, i, qu. 1, a. 3 and iv, qu. 4, a. 1-2 (God, per legem naturalem, gave individuals a right of self-preservation, and with it—because self-preservation is impossible in isolation—an instinct for society, and thus He gave the congregata Respublica authority over itself and its members), Victoria, iii, nos. 4-8, Bellarmine, De laicis, cc. 5-6, Claudio de Carmin, i, c. 9.

Suarez on
the origin of
sovereignty

61. Suarez (iii, c. 3, nos 6-7) compares the sovereignty of the corpus politicum et mysticum with the liberty of the individual person. In both cases there is an authority over the self and its own members—an authority which is necessarily given with and by the fact of existence. Now as the child receives its existence from its father, but its liberty from God, in virtue of Natural Law, sta haec potestas datur communis hominum ab auctore naturae, non tamen sine interventu voluntatum et consensuum hominum, ex quibus talis communitas perfecta congregata est. As the father can beget or not beget the child, but if he begets it can only beget it as a free being, so it only needs a human will directed to that end to bring the community into existence, but ut illa communitas habeat potestatem praedictam, non est necessaria specialis voluntas hominum, sed ex natura rei consequatur et ex providentia auctoris naturae. Just because they are not inherent in the nature of either, the sovereignty of the community and the liberty of the individual are both alike alienable and transferable. See the author's Althusius, p. 67.

The
theologians really make the community an aggregate of individuals

62. Such a view is already implied in the argument, that sovereignty must originally belong to the community because there is no discoverable reason why it should belong to one person rather than another. cf Victoria, op. cit no 7, Bellarmine, op. cit., Molina, d. 22, Suarez, iii, c 2, nos 1-4. But it appears more explicitly in the further conception, that the community is driven by the nature of things to transfer its original authority to a ruler because it cannot, as a multitudo, exercise that authority itself cf Victoria, op. cit. no 8, Bellarmine, op. cit. (where it is definitely said that supreme authority immediate iungam in subiecto in tota multitudine est, but is transferred by this multitudo). Soto argues in the same sense, iv, qu. 1, a. 1.

A similar line is adopted by Molina (ii, c 23). While describing the sovereignty it does not explain, or create, the institution of marriage. The institution is an inherent part of the divine scheme, and the agreement of the parties is simply an agreement to fit themselves into that scheme, which exists per se apart from their agreement.

reignty of the people as the authority of a body over its members, he none the less takes the totum corpus to be the [mere] sum of all, and he depicts the transference of authority to a Ruler as a command of Natural Law, inasmuch as otherwise [i.e. if the transference were not made] all would be constantly obliged to act in unison and by unanimity.

Even Suarez, in spite of the emphasis which he attaches to the corporate nature of the unity of the people, cannot transcend the conception of that unity as a mere collection of all its members. He describes the hominum collectio (iii, c. 2, no. 3), or the tota communitas (ibid. no. 4), as the original 'Subject' of supreme authority, and he contented himself with adding that multitudo hominum dupliciter considerari potest (1) uno modo, ut est aggregatione quoddam sine ulla ordine vel unione physica vel moralis, (2) also modo, quatenus specialis voluntate seu communis consensu in unum corpus politicum congregantur uno societatis vinculo et ut mutuo se juvent in ordine ad unum finem politicum, quo modo efficiunt unum corpus mysticum, quod moraliter dici potest per se unum. He argues that it is only in this second mode or sense that the community is the 'Subject' of a communis potestas, cui singulis de communitate parere tenentur, in the first sense or mode it only possesses such authority, at the most, radicaliter (iii, c. 2, no. 4, cf. ii, c. 3, nos. 1 and 6—rudis collectio sive aggregation as distinct from corpus mysticum).*

63. In Buchanan (pp. 11 sqq.), Mariana (i, c. 1), Rossaeus (c. 1, § 1), Boucher (cc. 10 sqq.) and Paurmeister (i, c. 17, nos. 35 sqq.), the authority of the State is regarded as proceeding merely from the social union of free and equal individuals who originally lived in isolation. Althusius (Polit. cc. 1 sqq.) ascribes the rights of all associations to a communicatio mutua in things, services and rights which are useful and necessary for social life. Grotius (ii, c. 5, §§ 17 sqq. and c. 20, iii, c. 2, § 6) derives the rights of the State, including the power of punishment, entirely from the original rights of individuals. Milton (The Tenure, pp. 8–10) considers the authority of the State as the product of a contract of society formed among men who are naturally born free, 'this authority and power of self-defence and preservation being originally and naturally in every one of them, and unitedly in them all'. See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 105 sqq., 344 sqq.

64. A typical example of this conception is the way in which Salomonius (pp. 33–42) attempts to prove that populus ipse suis legibus ligatur, although nobody can be imperans and obediens at the same time, and nobody can be seipso potenter. In reality, he argues, each law is a contract, and the people is a contractually united body of persons. The very beginning of the curtas, as a civis societas, already implies binding contracts, and therefore laws. It is all a question, not of the obligation of the people to itself, but of mutual obligation between the individual members of the people—societas non subi obligatur, sed ipsi inter se socii; and the Ruler, who occupies the position of praepontus or institor in the societas, is no less bound than the other members. Cf. Milton's phrase (op. cit. p. 8), 'a common league to bind each other from mutual injury'.

The authority of the State as a sum of individual rights

Salomonius on the State as a sum of contractual obligations

* Here again (cf. the translator's note appended to note 60), the theory of the theologians seems really to be higher than Gierke allows. The consenting parties who are necessary to the existence of a political society (just as they are necessary to the institution of marriage) may be, as such, only an aggregate. But the institution which emerges from their act of agreement as a number of individuals is a part of the divine scheme, and is a true 'mystical body' in that scheme. The distinction is fundamental, and if we accept it the State is really a corpus.

Althusius
on the State as a partnership

The State
in Grotius
partly a Corporation partly a partnership

The People
as a sum, or a Collection of units

65. Althusius identifies the body politic (corpus symbioticum) with the contractual community of the members of the people (communio symbiotica universalis): he bases all the rights of governing authority on the obligation, incurred in and by the contract of society, to participate in a communicatio of material and spiritual benefits and means of action; and he ascribes to the government only the position of 'administrator' of such matters as are the objects of this communicatio. Cf. Polit. cc. 9sqq.; Dicasologia, I, c. 81; and the author's work on Althusius, pp. 21sqq.

66. Cf. Grotius (II, c. 5, §23): consociatio, qua multi patresfamilias in unum populum ac curitatem coenam, maximum dat jus corpori in partes, qua haec perfectissima est societas, neque ulla est actio hominis externa, quae non ad hanc societatem aut per se speciet aut ex circumstantibus spectare possit. In §24 he argues that the individual is entitled by Natural Law to terminate his membership [of the State]; but just as in the societas privata of Roman law a member cannot quit if his leaving affects the society, so here he can only quit on condition of paying in ready money his share of any debt with which the State may be burdened, or of providing an idemius in lieu of himself if the State be engaged in war: moreover departure is often forbidden by positive law, and a pactum sic iurum is valid. In II, c. 20, §§7-8, he argues that it follows from the act of consent, implied in entry into civil society, that res singulorum may be sacrificed for the sake of publica utilitas in the event of the conclusion of a peace-treaty, but it equally follows, he adds, that individuals have a claim to compensation for war-losses from the means at the disposal of the community. The reason is that, though the infliction of injury and loss on an external enemy is lawful in war, cives inter se sunt socii, et aequum est ut communis habeant damnata quae societas causa contingat. But positive law may ordain, none the less, ut rei bello amissae nulla adversus curitatem actio sit, ut sua quaque arcuus defendat.

67. For Althusius the sovereign People is identical with the consociata multitudo, with homines conjuncti, consociati et cohaerentes, with the universa membra conjunctum, with the populus universus, with the consociatio universalis; with the totum corpus (Polit. Praef. cc. 9 and 17, Dicasologia, I, cc. 7-8). Similarly the author of the Vindictae contra Tyrannos identifies the sovereign with the populus conjunctum non divisum, the universi, or the universa multitudo (qu. II, pp. 75, 89sqq., 91sqq., 114; qu. III, pp. 149, 171sqq., 297sqq.). To Buchanan, the sovereign is the universus populus (pp. 16, 30, 48, 78-80, 87); to Hotoman, it is the universus populus or universi (Francogallia, cc. 6-9 and 19), to Danaeus, the subditus or populus universus (I, c. 4, pp. 36-44, III, c. 6, pp. 217 sqq.), to Boucher, the multitudo iure coacta, which must not be confused with the incondita et confusa turba (I, c. 9); to Mariana, the universi (I, c. 8), to Salomonus, the multitudo hominum or universi (I, pp. 20, 36), to Rossacus, the universi (c. 2, §11); to Hoemonius, the universi, or populus universus, or populus tributum curiaturum centuriatum vel veritum collectus (II, §§46, 51; IX, §5); to Milton, 'all as united together' (The Tenure, p. 9).

In the same way majestas realis is ascribed by Kirchner to the societas populi coalita (II, §1); by Paurmeister, to the populus universus (I, c. 17), by Berck-ringer, to the populus universus... collective—but also, at the same time, to the singuli: as members of this collective body (I, c. 4, §§6-8), by Alstedius, to the subditus universi (p. 18), by Werdenhagen, to the people as collectuum quid, possessed of quantitative and qualitative attributes (II, c. 6). Similarly, again, we find the 'Subject' of original sovereignty, and of the popular rights which persist after the alienation of that sovereignty, described in Soto as the multitudo collectum sumpta or the populus congregatus (i, qu. 1, a. 3, qu. 7, a. 2; iv, qu. 4, a. 1-2); in Victoria, as the multitudo or omnes simul (iii, nos. 8, 15); in Bellarmine, as the tota multitudo (cf. n. 62 supra); in Molina, as the sum of all (ii, d. 22-3, 25, iii, d. 6), in Suarez, as the hominum collectio or multitudo (cf. n. 62 supra). Grotius too regards the universitas as consisting only of singulis quique congregata vel in summam reputata (ii, c. 21, §7); and Keckermann describes the people as collectuum quid ordinatum (Præcogn. p. 7).

68. The advocates of the theory of popular sovereignty, like those of the Omnes ut theory of 'double sovereignty', expressly emphasise the fact that the Ruler singulis and is superior to his subjects ut singulis, but inferior to them ut universi. Cf. the ut universi Vind. contra Tyr. qu. ii, pp. 91sqq., qu. iii, pp. 391sqq.; Buchanan, pp. 79-80 (the king is to singulis, as the people is to the king), Salomonius, i, p. 20 (the king is major singulis, sed minor universi, as being the servus universitatis, but not the singulorum minister) and p. 28; Rossaeus, c. 2, §11; Danaeus, iii, c. 6, pp. 217sqq.; Althusius, c. 9, §18 (non singulis, sed conjunctum universi membris et toto corpori consociatis regni competit); Hoenionius, ii, §46 (universi, not singuli, are the Superior), Alstedius, p. 18 (superior singulis, inferior subditis universi) and pp. 56sqq.; Milton, Defensio of 1651, p. 70 (Rex est Rex singulorum, and also universorum, but only si voluerint).

Conversely, the advocates of the sovereignty of the Ruler argue that the Ruler is superior not only to singulis but also to universi cf. Soto, iv, qu. 4, a. 1; Molina, ii, d. 23, §8; Bornitus, Part. p. 41, De maj. c. 4. Cf. also Bornitus, De maj. c. 6 (the end of the State is salus seu beatitudo republicae sive populi universi primum, deinde singulorum), Suarez, iii, c. 2, no. 4 (supra, n. 62); Grotius, i, c. 3, §§7-9, 12, iii, c. 8, §4.

69. Cf. Salomonius, i, p. 36 (although the populus una interdum censetur persona, it is only ut ficta una, and vere populus non aliud est quam quaedam hominum multitudo); Suarez, i, c. 6, no. 17 (una persona ficta), iii, c. 2, no. 4 (unum corpus mysticum, quod maiestatis dico potest per se unum), Vind. c. Tyr. qu. ii, p. 75 (*universitas unius personae vicem sustinet, as the Lex mortuo teaches); Lumnaeus, Capitul. nos. 48sqq. (maiestas realis is the power quaes Repuplicas adhaeret, hoc est universitat, quae non nisi ficta personae nomen inducere potest, ex persona tamen constat), Grotius, ii, c. 21, §8, Werdenhagen, ii, c. 6, §§22-4 (persona is used in political theory only for the singulus, but in iure it is also used for populus, for an office, for a universitas, and in all cases in which plures personas unus sustinet).

70. When a decision of the whole people is required, thinkers often speak vaguely of a consensus populi or a voluntas universorum, without going into the question whether or no they mean a regular act of an assembly which must follow the forms that are necessary for the decisions of a corporation cf. Buchanan, pp. 16sqq., 30sqq., 78, Rossaeus, c. 2, §4 (the consensus populi as the will of the Respublica), Salomonius, i, pp. 8sqq., 11, 31sqq.; Mariana, i, c. 9, Vasquez, c. 47, Molina, ii, d. 25, Suarez, iii, c. 4, nos. 1-2, c. 4, no. 5, c. 9, no. 4, Boxhorn, i, c. 3, §§15sqq. (since rule is contrary to nature, it depends on the constant consensus of imperans and subdit); Grotius, i, c. 3, §§8 (populi universum sumptu arbitrio), 13 (populi voluntate delata), ii, c. 6, §§3, 7, 13, iii, c. 20, §5 (populi totius consensu); Salmasius, c. 6 (sovereignty belongs to the King either ut or voluntate populi).

The unity of
the People
a 'Fiction'

The common will an agreement of many wills

* The reference actually given in the Vind. c. Tyr. is to Lex mortis 22 D, de fidei commissariis.

But we often find the decision of the people definitely treated as equivalent to the tacit and cumulative acts of consent of so many individuals. This idea is applied to the conclusion of the original contract of government, or to some later act of approval of a limited government which is a substitute for that contract: cf. Vind c. Tyr qu. m, pp. 264sqq., 287sqq; [Beza's] De iure mag. qu. 5, pp. 18-20 (where the condition is made that the consensus must not be forced); Danaeus, I, c. 4, p. 41; Hoeronius, IX, §§56-7; Suarez, III, c. 4, no. 4 (the consensus is 'tacit' when rule has been usurped, but it is debitus when subjection has been imposed by a just war), c. 10, no. 7 (consensus tacitus); Arnisacu, De auct. c. 4, §§11-14, Der ep. n, c. 2, s. 5, c. 3, ss. 7-8 (consensus tacitus, and until it is given there are no subdit), Knipschuldt, VI, c. 4, nos. 12-13 (no right [of government] exists until subdit paulatim consenserunt), Fridenreich, c. 10 (all Ruling authority rests upon electio, since it is the consensus universorum which has either devolved it upon the ruler originally, or legitimised it afterwards); Bornitius, De mag. c. 3, Part. pp. 478sqq. (consensus spontaneus aut coactus, expressus vel tacitus, terus vel quasi, is what constitutes the Ruler); Grotius, I, c. 4, §§5sqq., II, c. 6, §18; and see the author's work on Althusius, pp. 305-7.

Similarly we often find writers who argue that the consent of 'the people' is required for laws contenting themselves with an informal approbatio (Molina, II, d. 23, §§6-7, V, d. 46, §3) or an acceptatio populi (Suarez, IV, c. 19, and Claudius de Carnin, I, c. 3). In the same way consensus tacitus was held to suffice for certain alienations [of public property] (Grotius, II, c. 6, §§8, 10).

On the other hand, many thinkers demand a formal resolution by a regular assembly in certain cases. Most of them, though there are some exceptions, require it for the deposition of a lawful ruler who has become a tyrant 'in exercise', cf. Soto, IV, qu. 4, a. 1, Molina, III, d. 6; Vind c. Tyr, qu. III, pp. 292sqq., Mariana, I, c. 6 (conventus publicus), Althusius, c. 38, cf. the author's work on Althusius, pp. 309-12. Some writers also require an act of a regular assembly for the appointment of the Ruler, cf. Soto, IV, qu. 4, a. 2 (publicus conventus), Vind c. Tyr qu. III, pp. 248sqq. It may also be required as a way of giving assent to certain alienations [of public property], cf. Grotius, II, c. 6, §9.

71. Molina, d. 23 (supra, n. 62). Althusius (c. 9, §§16 and 18) holds that only universa membra de communis consensu can dispose of the jus majestatis, because only membra regni universa simul can constitute that right, but he also believes (cf. his Preface; cf. also c. 9, §19; c. 18, §§15, 84, 104, 123-4, and c. 38, §§125-9) that even the whole of the people, acting unanimously, cannot make any valid alienation or division of sovereignty. Hoeronius (II, §99) regards regnicolae as competent to decide jura regni 'by common consent'; cf. also his phrase (§40) ex communis placito... vita socialis inter membra reipublicae institutus et regitur.

72. The assumption of unanimity was taken for granted in regard to the contract of society; cf. Althusius, c. 9, §19; Suarez, III, c. 3 (per voluntatem omnium qui in illa convenerunt); Grotius, II, c. 5, §23 (vide supra, nn. 59-62). The consensus omnium is required for any change in fundamental laws by Bortius (De mag. II, §17-21); and, as we have already mentioned (supra, n. 43), Besold (De mag. s. I, c. 1, §5) and Tulden (I, c. 11) require the consent of omnes singuli in a democracy for any change of ipsae leges democraticas. According to Althusius (Dicæologia, I, c. 87, nos. 37-43) a unanimous resolution

All must act if the People is to act

When unanimity required

should also precede the imposition of new taxes. [Gierke adds a reference to a note in a previous section of his fourth volume (p. 241), which is not translated here.]

78. Cf. Althusius, c. 17, § 58, Buchanan, p. 79 (universus populus vel major pars is legislator, creator of government, and judge of the King), Milton, Defensio of 1651, c. 5, pp. 69–4, c. 7, pp. 69–70 (Populi pars major et potior, i.e. plus quam dimidia pars populi, is Superior Rege) Generally, a majority-decision was regarded as adequate both for the [original] choice of a form of State and appointment of a Ruler, and for any subsequent changes in the constitution, cf. Victoria, III, nos. 14–5 (in the appointment of a Ruler a majority is enough, etiam alius inveniatur, since the consent of all cannot be attained, the whole of Christianity might give itself a Ruler by majority-decision; and in the same way a majority in a republic may, if it wishes, choose a monarch), Soto, qu. 4, a. 2, supra, n. 43.

74. In most writers we only find a reference to the general rules of the [Roman] law of corporations. Grotius is the first writer (II, c. 5, § 17) to use the fiction that the majority-principle must have been introduced by an act of contract into all associations, both public and private (quod in iis rebus, ob quas consociatio quaque instituta est, universitas et eius pars major nomine universitatis obligant singulos qui sunt in societate) He argues (1) that in each contract of society we must assume a voluntas in societatem coniunctum.. ut ratio aliqua esset expediti negotia, (2) that this ratio, or way of transacting business, can only consist in the supremacy of the majority, because it is obviously improper ut pars major sequatur minorem, and therefore (3) that so far as special potestas et leges do not provide otherwise, paris major habet jus integrum. Hobbes takes a similar view (De cive, c. 6, §§ 1–2). Only unanimity is valid in a multitudo extra curiam, but it marks the beginning of the transformation of such a multitude into a State when its members agree ut in iis rebus, quae a quopiam in cœtu proponentur, pro voluntate omnium habeatur id quod voluntur eorum major pars. Otherwise no single will can be attained. If any person will not accept this agreement, the rest can constitute the State without him, and can exercise against him their original right—the jus bellum: cf. ibid. § 20.

75. See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 216–19, and § 12, n. 129 of this volume [not here translated]. The author of the Vind. c. Tyr. invokes, as the organ for securing the observance of the rights and duties imposed by contract (whether it be the contract made with God, or that made with the king*), not the universa multitudo, but the electi magistratus regni—the officiarii Regni non Regis, or consortes et ephori imperii—inasmuch as these officers a populo auctoritatem accepissent, and thus universum populi coetum repreäsentant. qu. II, p. 89, qu. III, pp. 148sqq. A similar view appears in the De jure mag. qu. 6–7 (ordines sive status), Buchanan, p. 30 (ex omnibus ordinibus selecti); Hotoman, cc. 13–14, Mariana, I, c. 8 (proceres or deputati).

Althusius includes both the 'Ephors' and the summus magistratus among the administratores of public authority, who are appointed and commissioned by the consociata multitudo because it cannot easily meet itself, and who, within the limits of their commission, universum populum repreäsentant (c. 18, §§ 1–47): Ephori sunt quibus, populi in corpus politicum consociati consensu, demandata est summa Reipublicae seu universalis consociationis, ut repreäsentantes eandem potestate

When majority-decision allowed

The fiction that majority-decision is made equal to unanimous decision by a contract to that effect

Representation of the People by Estates or 'Ephors'

* The Vind. c. Tyr. supposes two contracts—that of people and king with God (the divine covenant), and that of people and king (the secular contract of government).

et iure illius utantur in summo magistratu constituendo, eoque ope [ei] consilio in negotiis corporis consociati juvando, necnon in ejusdem licentia coercenda et impedienda in causis unius et Reip. perniciosis, et eodem intra limites officiis contineendo, et demique in prouidendo et curando omnibus modis, ne Resp. quid detrimenti capiat prouetus studiis, odisi, factio, omissione vel cessatione summo magistraturu (ibid §48). These 'ephors' are appointed by popular election, but they may also be appointed, ex populi concessione et beneficio, by nomination or co-optation (§59) their commission may also be made hereditary ex consensu consociationis universalis (§107); they constitute a collegium, which acts collegialiter and by its major pars (§62). as such a college they discharge the officium generale, with which they are vested, of representative exercise of popular rights (§§63-89, c. 38, §§28sqq.), but there is also, distinct from this 'general office' of the college, an officium speciale of individual 'ephors' (c. 18, §§90-1, c. 38, §§46-52) *

Hoemonius has a similar theory (II, §§46-51, IX, §§44-54) 'ephori seu ordines regni have to exercise the right of the sovereign people ex iusso et consensu populi; as universi, quatenus universum populum reppresentant, they are superior to the Ruler. Grotius argues (II, c. 6, §9) 'populum autem consensu intelligimus, non totus eis . sive per legatos partium integrantium mandatu sufficiente instructos, nam facimus et quod per alium facimus, cf. I, c. 3, §10, III, c. 20, §5. See also Fridenreich (c. 10), who holds that, in lieu of universi, smaller assemblies have often to elect the Ruler by virtue of 'delegation': Tuldien (II, cc. 19-23), who regards the optima forma as a monarchia temperata, optimatibus aut dilectis populis in partem regumini admisso) Milton (Defensio of 1651, c. 7, p. 70), who argues that the objection of Salmasius (that we regard plebs solis as populus) is incorrect, for we include omnes ordinis cuiuscunq; civis in the people, inasmuch as unam tantummodo supremam curiam stabiliusimus, in qua etiam proceres ut pars populi, non pro se se quidem solis, ut antea, sed pro iis numeris, a quibus electi fuerint, suffragia ferendi legitum jus habent.

*The People
as superior to its representatives*

76. The author of the Vind c. Tyr. ascribes to the assembly of the 'ephors', as Regni quan Epitome, equal rights with the people, and an equal superiority with the people over the king, inasmuch as any act of a majority of that assembly counts as the action of the people (qu. II, pp. 91, 94, 114, qu. III, pp. 148, 149, 248sqq., 297sqq., 326sqq.), but he expressly insists that this assembly cannot, by any resolution or any omission on its part, forfeit the rights of the populus constitutus (qu. III, p. 173). The same line is adopted in the De iure mag. (qu. 6-7): the ephors, in regard to the Ruler, are defensores ac protectores iurium ipsius supremae potestatis [i.e. they are the guardians of popular sovereignty], but they cannot actually prejudice the sovereign rights of the people itself. Buchanan (pp. 30sqq.) only allows the assembly of Estates to produce a προβούλευτα in the sphere of legislation, vindicating the right of final decision for the universus populus

*Althusius
safeguards
the People as against its Ephors*

77. Althusius expressly insists that though the Ephors, in their collective position as representatives of the sovereign People, are superior to the Ruler, and though, in their assembly, they exercise the rights of majestas in respect to him (c. 18, §§48-89, c. 33, c. 28, §§28-64, and also c. 17, §§55-61), they are merely commissioners of the people; constituantur, remouentur, dejacentur aut

* This whole theory of the 'ephorate' (which appears later in Fichte) is derived from Calvin's Institutes (IV, c. xx, §31) where he speaks of 'magistrates constituted for the defence of the people, to bridle kings, such as the Ephors in Sparta, the tribunes at Rome and to-day, it may be, in each kingdom the Three Estates assembled'.

exauciorantur by the people; and they must recognise the people as their Superior (c. 9, §§ 22–3). Accordingly while he applies to the Ephors the principle that the action of corporate representatives counts as the action of the corporation itself (c. 18, §§ 11, 26, 53–8), he limits the application of this principle by the limits of their commission (ibid. §§ 41–6), and he expressly argues that the Ephors cannot transfer any right of the People to the Ruler, or forfeit any such right by omitting to exercise it, since, in that case, penes Ephorus, non Rem publicam et Populum, sumnum Reip. jus esset (ibid. § 124). Again, if there be any failure of the Ephors, he claims that all their functions revert to the community of the people, in virtue of its imprescriptible and inviolable right, and then these functions are to be exercised consensu totius populi tributum, curiam, centuriam vel virum rogati aut collecti (ibid. § 123). Similar views appear in Hoennius, II, §§ 46, 51, IX, § 50.

78. This is the view of Hotoman (cc. 13 sqq.), Boucher (I, c. 9, II, c. 20; III, c. 8), Danaeus (III, c. 2, p. 221), Mariana (I, c. 8), Milton (op. cit.); cf. Alstedius, pp. 56–61 (the ordines [or Estates] are a Reip. compendium), Friedenreich, c. 29, and Keckermann, c. 4, pp. 561 sqq. We also find German professors of public law (and especially Paurmeister, Besold and Limnaeus) generally ascribing to the people of the Reich the rights exercised by the Reichstag, and even the electoral right of the Electors, just as they also ascribe the rights of provincial Estates to the people of the province as the true 'Subject'. cf. supra [in a part of vol. IV not here translated], p. 242 n. 129. Bortius (De maj. v, § 9), in speaking of majestas realis, remarks that its possessor is tota Res publica, et secundario ordines et status regni.

*The People
itself as the true
'Subject' of popular
rights*

79. See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 90–91, 343.

80. Supra, n. 46.

81. Supra, n. 47.

82. The 'Subject' of Sovereignty in a Republic is plures, according to Victoria (III, no. 10), Bellarmino (De laici, c. 6), Bustus (I, c. 3, § 4), Keckermann (II, c. 2), and others; it is either pauci or universi, according to Bodin (II, c. 1) and Suarez (III, c. 4, nos. 1, 5–6, 11). It is multi, which may again be either pauciores or universi, according to Bornitus (De maj. c. 3, and Part p. 45). It is pauciores or tota civitas, according to Winkler (v, c. 4). Similarly, in the view of Grotius (I, c. 3, § 7), plures are the subjectum proprium of majestas in a Republic, and plures or universi are the 'Subject' of majestas personalis in this form of State on the theory of the advocates of 'double sovereignty' (e.g. Alstedius, p. 14, Tulden, p. 12, Besold, De maj. sect. I, cc. 2–7). The theorists of popular sovereignty also make a plurality of persons into the organ of government in Republics: cf. Mariana, I, c. 3; Danaeus, I, c. 6, and Althusius, c. 39, § 1 (summus magistratus polyarchicus). On the technical term 'Polyarchy' see n. 46 supra.

*The
plurality
of the 'Subject' of Sovereignty
in a Republic*

83. Cf. Bodin, II, c. 6 (the magnates, in a system of aristocracy, collectum imperant), and c. 7 (where the same is said to be true, in a status popularis, of plurality a collectiva), Bornitus, Part. p. 51 (the cives collectum units are to be regarded as the Ruler), Keckermann, II, c. 2 (plures ex aequo indivisi), Althusius, c. 39, §§ 32 sqq. (when there is a magistratus polyarchicus, the ruler is omnes conjunctim), §§ 46 sqq. (when there is a [magistratus] aristocraticus, the exercise of majesty belongs conjunctim et individuo paucis optimatus), §§ 57 sqq. (when there is a [magistratus] democraticus, the populus consociatus is also the summus magistratus). Similar views occur in Hoennius, IX, § 3, X, § 40; cf. also Gregorius, V, cc. 1–2; Molina, II, d. 23, §§ 1–14; Heider, pp. 976 sqq.;

*The
plurality
a collectiva*

Crüger, Coll. pol. Disp. I, III, IV; Arnissaetus, De rep. II, cc. 4-5; Knipschildt, I, c. 1, no. 50 (plures ut unversi).

This collective plurality is a single, but artificial, Ruling 'person'

84. Arnissaetus (De maj. I, c. 2; Pol. c. 11) contrasts the republican Ruler, as conspirations vel analogia unus, with the Ruler who is unus natura; Berck-ringer (I, c. 4, § 10) opposes the unus analogia to the unus numero; Graszwinkel (cc. 9, 11) contrasts the corpore unus with the persona unus; Bornitus (Part. p. 45; De maj. c. 3) opposes the unus τῷ λόγῳ to the persona unus. Keckermann (Pol. I, c. 2) explains that the whole perfection of the status polyarchicus depends upon the plures qui imperant assimilating themselves by their unity to a monarch. According to Althusius (c. 39, § 59) the essence of democracy lies in the fact that populus ipsos instar unus exercet iura maiestatis et quasi unum repreäsentat in imperando. Hippolitus a Lapide (I, cc. 3, 4, 6, 14, 15) assigns the rule in an aristocracy to the privileged Estates as constituting unum corpus, universitas vel collegium, etc. Cf. also Suarez, III, c. 3, nos. 7-8.

Hobbes (De cive, c. 7, §§ 13-14, c. 12, § 8, Leviathan, c. 18) insists most definitely that, as compared with the natura unus on which the will and action of the people is devolved in a monarchy, the democratic assembly or the aristocratic civis constitutes only an artificial unity. He draws the conclusion that, while a monarchical Ruler may contravene the Law of Nature, a republican Ruler cannot, on the ground that in the former case the natural and the artificial will are one and the same, but in the latter there is only an 'artificial will'. The pre-eminence of the monarchical form of State is constantly referred by most writers to the superiority of natural unity over unity which is artificial, cf. e.g. Bodin, VI, c. 4, nos. 710sqq., Hobbes, De cive, c. 10, Leviathan, c. 19.

85. Cf. Bodin, II, cc. 6, 7; Bornitus, Part. 41, De maj. c. 3, Althusius, c. 39, §§ 32sqq., Hobbes, Leviathan, c. 18, Hippolitus a Lapide, c. 3, sect. 3, c. 6, sect. 3, c. 7. Mention has already been made (supra, nn. 42, 43) of the difficulties into which thinkers fell in this connection, when they sought to extend to democracy the distinction between the people as the 'Subject' of popular rights and the people as the duly constituted Ruler. Keckermann (II, c. 3) finds even in a democracy [no less than in an aristocracy] a system of reciprocal alternation of ruling and being ruled.

86. Bodin (II, cc. 1, 6-7) refers the whole distinction between aristocracy and democracy to the numerical relation of rulers and ruled, making the former a rule of the minority, and the latter a rule of the majority. But since, from this point of view, he ranks as a democracy a state of 20,000 citizens in which 11,000 participate in the popular assembly, and since, again, he allows a majority of the assembly so constituted to decide, it follows that the universi vel major pars who, on his definition, are the rulers in a democracy may in certain circumstances be represented by a minority of the community.

Grotius again and again enumerates together the king or the major pars procerum or the major pars populi as being the 'Subjects' of international rights, according to the form of the constitution: cf. e.g. III, c. 20, §§ 2-4. Hobbes (De cive, c. 5, § 8) says bluntly: voluntas autem concilii intelligatur esse, quas est voluntas majoris partis eorum hominum, ex quibus concilium consistit, cf. c. 7, § 5. See also Bornitus, Part. p. 45 (universi aut majoris parti), Keckermann, II, c. 1; Besold, Disc. III, De democratis, c. 1, § 1 (populus vel major pars).

The community in a democracy identified with the majority

87. Cf. Bodin, II, cc. 6-7; Althusius, c. 39, §§ 37sqq. and 58sqq.; Hobbes, De cive, c. 7, §§ 6 and 10 (in an aristocracy, he argues, just as in a democracy, the time and place of the meeting must be fixed, because otherwise there will be non persona una, sed dissoluta multitudo sine imperio summo. For this reason the coetus or conventus is often described as the Ruler, and Hobbes constantly avails himself of the formula that Sovereignty resides either in unus homo or in unus coetus or unum concilium).

The assembly in a Republic described as the Ruler

88. See the antitheses in n. 84 supra.

89. Cf. Bodin, I, c. 8, nos. 105-6 Principis majorum pactis contentis aequus ac privatius obligatur, si regnum haereditario jure obveniatur, vel etiam testamento delatum sit: otherwise [i.e. where he has not obtained the Crown by inheritance or by will], he is [only] obliged quatenus Republicae commodo contractum est. [Gierke seems to have telescoped the argument of Bodin, which is really to the effect (1) that a king succeeding by hereditary or testamentary right is bound as a private man by the pacta contenta of his predecessors in title, but (2) that such a king is only bound to respect such pacta to the extent to which his predecessors were themselves bound—i.e. to the extent to which they were made for the benefit of the State] Cf. also Arnisaeus, De jure magistrorum et regum, I, c. 7.

How far is a Ruler obliged by the acts of his predecessors?

Grotius (I, c. 7, §§ 11-37, II, c. 14, §§ 10-14, III, c. 20, § 6) also starts from the point of view of the law of inheritance. He distinguishes two cases (1) When they are omnium bonorum heredes, the successores are absolutely obliged by the actions of their predecessors, (2) when in jus regni dumtaxat succedunt, they incur no personal obligation at all. In the latter case, however, there is still an obligation, which is produced and mediated per interpositam civitatem. There is a presumption that the devolution of supreme authority on a Ruler involves, as part of itself, the simultaneous devolution of the jus se obligandi, per se aut per maiorem sui partem, which belongs to the people just as it belongs to any other group (II, c. 14, § 10). It thus follows that, in so far as the people itself is obliged in virtue of this jus se obligandi, the successor will also be obliged ut caput (ibid. § 12). Now an obligation of the people is to be assumed not merely in any case of utiliter gestum [where there has been an act done in the definite expectation of a benefit], but also in any case where probabilis ratio is present [where there is good ground for expecting a benefit from an act done], and it is only in regard to contracts previously made by usurpers that the people—and with it, therefore, the rex verus—has merely a limited liability de in rem verso [for expenses actually incurred] (ibid. § 14).

90. Grotius, II, c. 14, §§ 1-2 and 6; III, c. 20, § 6 Controverting the thesis of Bodin, that the sovereign can dispense himself from his contracts, or recover his freedom of action (in integrum se restituere) in respect of such contracts, Grotius (II, c. 14, §§ 1-2) distinguishes actus Regis qui regu sunt and actus regis privatae. The first sort of acts count quasi communitas faceret in tales autem actus, sicut leges ab ipsa communitate factae vnu nullam habent, quia communitas seipsa superior non est, ita nec leges regiae; quare adversus hos contractus restitutio locum non habet; venit enim illa ex jure civili. At the same time Grotius maintains that the people can challenge such regi actus [though they count as acts done by itself] on the ground that they exceed either the special limits of the Ruler's right [in a given case] or the general limits of such right [in all cases]. The private acts of the king, on the other hand, count non ut actus communitalis sed ut actus proprius; and in case of doubt they fall under the ordinary law, and are thus subject to restituto in integrum and to the King's power of dispensing himself from leges positivae.*

Grotius distinguishes between the official and the personal acts of the King

140

In the same chapter (II, c. 14, §6) Grotius allows that contracts between the king and his subjects always give rise to a true and proper obligation; but he adds that it is only under Natural Law that this obligation can be asserted if the king has acted qua rex—though it may be also asserted at civil law if he has acted otherwise [i.e. qua privatua].

91. Grotius himself, in the passages just cited, has recourse to the right of the community of the people and the devolution of that right.

92. Cf. Guevara, Horologium Principiū, I, c. 36 (based on John of Salisbury—see Gierke, Political Theories of the Middle Age, translated by F W Maitland, p. 24): cf also Knichen, I, c. 6, thes 11 (which is similar), Modrevius, Of the betterment of the general welfare, 1557, p. 162, Buchanan, pp. 13sqq (a comparison of societas civilis with the human body and its ordering, articulation, harmony and unity), Gregorius Tholosanus, I, c. 1, §§6–16, III, c. 1, §1, x, c. 1, §1, XVIII, c. 1, §4, XXI, c. 1, §§4–10, and elsewhere (analogy of the corpus civilis with the corpus physicum, in regard to head and members, soul and nerves, harmony and unity, and the different powers and functions of the different parts—see also his Syntagma, III, c. 2, §§1–2), Lessius, Dedicatio of 1605 to the Archduke Albert of Austria (comparison of the Prince with the caput, of the respublica with the corpus, of civitatis with membra, of cives with artus ex quibus membra et totum respublicam corpus coalecunt), Besold, Princ. et fin. polit. doctr. Dissertatio, I, c. 5, §4, c. 8, §1, Diss. de maij sect. I, c. 1, §4, sect. 3, c. 3, §2, c. 7, §3 (comparison of the State with a corpus physicum or corpus humanum, in respect of its head and members, and the different functiones of each), Berckringer, I, c. 4, §10 (the Rulers are the head of a body, whose parts have also their functions), Werdenhagen, II, c. 24 (the essence of the State is uno—summum illud vmerandum vocabulum mysticum—a union produced by status et ordinatio harmonica, just as in a physical body), cf also Bodin, II, c. 7, no. 236 (resp. partes ac veluti membra singula, quae principi resp. quae capiti diligantur). It still continued, in our period, to be a favourite habit of thinkers to pursue this analogy into a theory (1) of the growth, the successive ages, the maladies and the death of States, and (2) of the methods which were serviceable in preserving or restoring their health: cf. Buchanan, op. cit.; Gregorius, lib. XXXI–XXXIV, Besold, Diss. II, de respublica curanda; Knipschildt, I, cc. 15–17. [On this analogy in general see Maitland, Collected Papers, III, pp. 285–303.]

Sovereignty
as the Soul of the State

93. See Besold, Diss. I, c. 5, §1; Arnisaeus, Polit. c. 6, De rep. I, 5, §. 3; Bornitus, De maij c. 5, Part. p. 45 (the fimis principaliis of majestas is animare imperio summo universali rempublicam), Fridericus, c. 10 (government is the spiritus vitalis of the body politic); Bortius, De maij, v, c. 8, Graszwinkel, c. 4 (quod in universo Deus, in corpore anima, id in imperio majestas est), Knipschildt, I, c. 1, nos. 50–51; Tuldien, I, c. 9 (urbs—corpus, civitas—anima, respublica—animus mens et ratio). [With the dictum of Grazzwinkel compare a dictum of the eighteenth century, quoted in Van Tyne, Causes of the War of American Independence, I, p. 218, to the effect that 'legislative sovereignty is as essential to the body politic as the Deity to religion'.]

* Grotius thus disagrees with Bodin so far as official acts of the king are concerned (the king cannot dispense himself from an official act of contract, or recover freedom of action in regard to such an act); but he agrees with him in regard to personal acts of the king.

94. See Gregorius, I, c. 1, §§6-7 and XVIII, c. 1, §4 (corpus civile, quod ex singularibus personis proprio corpore et animo compositum, tanquam membris, constat); cf. also Besold, De maj III, c. 7, §3.

95. See Victoria, III, no. 4, Soto, IV, qu. 4, art. 1; Molina, II, d. 22, §§8-9; Suarez, III, cc. 1-3 (supra, nn. 60-61). Vasquez, however, in c. 47, nos. 6-8, warns his readers against drawing conclusions from the analogy between the relation of populus and cives and that of corpus and membrum. There are also, he contends, fundamental differences the limb cannot change its position, and the citizen can; the foot or the hand cannot become head, but any citizen may, the death of the head causes death of the limbs, but the death of the head of the State produces no similar effect, in the body government remains always in the head, but in the State it may change its residence.

96. Althusius, Praef and c. 9, §§18-19 'majesty', like the anima in corpore physico, resides as an indivisible and inalienable unity in the corpus symbioticum universale considered as a whole: it is the basis of the rights of government which this whole exercises over its parts Cf also Ducologia, I, c. 7.

97. Grotius (II, c. 9, §3), referring erroneously to ancient writers,* ascribes έχω μέλαν ου σπίρτιον τον to the people, regarded as a corpus ex distinibus [sc. compositum]. He adds, is autem spiritus sive έχεις in populo est inter civium consociatio plena atque perfecta, cuius prima productio est summum imperium, vinculum per quod res publica cohaeret; plane autem haec corpora artificialia instar habent corporis naturalis. Just as the latter [the natural body] idem non esse desinit particulis paulatim mutatis, so the former—the 'moral' body of the People—remains the same though its members change. But like the natural organism, the People may also succumb, and lose its rights, and it may do so (1) interitu corporis, that is to say, either by the simultaneous disappearance of all its members (§4) or by the disintegration of their unity (§5), or (2) interitu spiritus, that is to say, by losing any supreme authority (§6). On the other hand, the People still remains a 'Subject' of rights and duties, as much as ever, in spite of any alienation of territory (§7) or any alteration of the constitution (§8), and the union of two peoples to form one (§9), or the division of one people into several (§10), produces no loss of a people's rights, but only a communicatio or divisio of rights, as the case may be. See further I, c. 1, §6, c. 3, §7; II, c. 5, §23 (maximum jus corporis in partes), c. 6, §§4-5 (imperium in an undivided body politic is like the soul in the body), c. 16, §16 (the body politic remains the same even if the constitution be altered), c. 21, §7 (on mors of the body politic).

But Grotius, while he notes these analogies, also remarks (I, c. 3, §7) that in contrast with the 'natural body' the corpus morale may have one common head for a number of bodies [e.g. in the case of a federal State]. Going more into detail (II, c. 6, §§4-5), he argues that the 'moral body', being voluntate contractum, is different in kind from the 'natural body'. Owing to its contractual origin, the integral parts of a moral body are non ita sub corpore ut sunt partes corporis naturalis, quae sine corpore vita vivere non possunt, et ideo in

* Gierke here refers the reader back to vol. III of the Gesellschaftsrecht, p. 22, n. 47, and to the correction on p. viii of his preface to that volume. The point is that Grotius was doing violence to Stoic theory, and to Plutarch and the Roman lawyers who used that theory, when he ascribed to them his own idea that a single spirit pervades bodies composed of different parts. The Stoics and their followers, Gierke contends, held no such view.

Vasquez on differences between the body and the Body Politic

usum corporis recte abscondentur. The right of a moral body over its parts is ex primaeva voluntate metendum, and the amputation of parts against their will is therefore unjustifiable; while, conversely, the part may secede from the body—not, it is true, without due reason, but the plea of necessity will serve as such a reason. Again 'the right of a part to protect itself' is greater than 'the right of the body over the part', qua pars utitur pars quod ante societatem inimam habuit, corpus non tem. Grotius also emphasises the point (in his note to n, c. 9, §3) that it is only ἀναλογικῶς that he speaks of the corpus and the ētēs or spiritus of the People.

The double 'Subject' of sovereignty

98. Grotius, I, c. 3, §7 ut versus subjectum commune est corpus, proprium oculus, so the whole body politic and the Ruler are both simultaneously 'Subjects' of political authority [the one generally, and the other specifically].

99. Whereas Victoria (m, no. 4) still expressly insists that the civitas is no intentionem or artificium, but a natura profecta est, and therefore properly comparable to the human body, Grotius already speaks of it as a corpus artificiale, and as voluntate contractum (cf. supra n. 97 and n, c. 9, §8)

Hobbes on the analogy of the Body Politic

100. Compare the introduction to the Leviathan, where is qua summam potestatem habet is described as anima totum corpus vivificans et movens, the authorities and officials are the artificial joints; rewards and punishments are the motor nerves, the wealth of all is the strength of the body; the safety of the people is its business or function; the counsellors are its memory; equity and the laws are its artificial reason; concord is its health, sedition its sickness, and civil war its death. Finally, pacta quibus partes huius corporis politici conglutinantur imitantur divinum illud verbum 'Fiat' sive 'Factumus hominem' a Deo prolatum in principio cum crearet mundum. Cf. Leviathan, c. 17, De cive, c. 5

The organism of Hobbes is really a mechanism

101. Intro. to the Leviathan just as ars humana imitates nature, which is the ars divina, and just as it creates (in the watch, or automaton, or machine with springs and wheels) an artificiale animal with a vita artificialis, so it also imitates that nobilissimum animal Man. Magnus ille Leviathan, quae Civitas appellatur, opificium artis est et Homo artificialis, quamquam homine naturali, propter cuius protectionem et salutem exigitatus est, multo major, and Man is here at one and the same time matris and artifex. Cf. De cive, c. 5 and c. 7, §§108sqq., and Leviathan, c. 17, on the voluntas artificiosa of this body, Leviathan, c. 19, on successio as the way of continuation of its vita artificialis, ibid., c. 20 and following, on the mathematical rules for the construction of this artifice, and c. 21 [? c. 26] on laws as vincula artificia

People and State identified by Monarchomachs

102. Thus the Vind c Tyr, qu. m, describes the king as minister or servus Republicae (p. 144), and the representatives of the People as officiari Regis non Regis (p. 148), but otherwise always depicts the community of the People as the 'Subject' of supreme authority (pp. 143sqq., 248sqq., 292sqq.). In the same way Hotoman makes the immortal Respublica or the Regnum superior to the mortal king (Francogallia, c. 19); but he proceeds to identify this 'Subject' [of supreme authority] with ipsa civium ac subjectorum universitas et quasi corpus republicae and with the populus (ibid. c. 19, Quæst. illust. qu. 1), and he expressly declares that summæ potestas est populi (Francogallia, c. 19). Boucher (I, c. 9) states in so many words that the sovereign People in its corporate unity is identical with the Regnum or Respublica: cf. II, c. 20, III, c. 8. Rousseau (c. 2, §§1 and 11) ascribes to the king only a potestas potestatis Republicæ subjecta, and declares the Respublica universa to be superior [i.e. sovereign]. Mariana (I, cc. 8-9) sometimes describes the Respublica, and sometimes universi, as the 'Subject' of majesty. According to Hoenomus (n, §§ 39, 41, 51, and ix, §§ 5, 44–50) it is the Respublica, the Respublica seu membra ejus, the populus, the populus universus, or the totus populus, which is the terus dominus of political authority, the source of all government, and potior Monarchus. In the treatise [of Beza] De jure mag. (qu 6), summum imperium is ascribed to the People, but occasionally this summum imperium is itself personified. cf. pp. 26sqq., where the magistratus subalterni are described as dependent not on the summus magistratus, but on ipsa supremas or on summa illa imperii seu regni dominas et authoritas, cf. also pp. 37sqq. and 74sqq., where the Estates are regarded as defensores ac protectores iurium ipsius supremae potestatis, even as against the Monarch himself. In Buchanan (pp. 16sqq., 48sqq and 78–90) and in Danaeus (i, c. 4, iii, c. 6) it is the populus universus or subditi who appear as the 'Subject' of supreme authority.

103. The Vind c Tyr. (qu ii, pp. 89, 114sqq., qu. iii, pp. 89, 114sqq., Rights 131sqq., 144, 148, 192sqq., 196, 292sqq.)* deals in this way with the ascribed appointment of kings and representatives of the People, with the right of indifferently legislation, with the control of officials, and with the right of resistance or to People deposition in the event of disobedience to God or felonia contra populum [i.e. or State it sometimes ascribes all these rights to the Populus, and sometimes to the Respublica]. Hotoman (cc 6–8) deals in the same way with the right of appointing, judging and deposing the king, and with the right of deciding about a disputed succession. Cp. Rossaeus, c. 2, §§ 8–9 (on the right of the Respublica in the matter of legislation and consent to taxation) with § 4* cf also Boucher, i, cc 10–19 and iii, cc 14–17.

104. Cf the Vind c Tyr. (qu iii, pp. 218sqq. and 235sqq.): the patri-monum Regni belongs to the People, and not to the king. the king has no right of property in the possessions of the Fisc, the demesne, etc., and he cannot therefore alienate any part of them indeed, he is not even the usufructuarius (since he cannot so much as contract a mortgage), but only the administrator. Hotoman (c. 9) argues that the nude proprietas in the demesne, regarded as the dos Regni, resides penes universitatem populi sive Rempublicam, cf. Quaest. illustr. qu. i. According to Hoenonius (ii, c. 39) jura regni, ratione proprietatis et dominii, pertinent ad Rempublicam seu membra ejus, sed ratione usus et administrationis spectant ad magistratum, cia sunt commendata, cf. also v, § 72, where a distinction is drawn between the aerarium publicum, which is Re-publicae proprium, and the aerarium Principis, which belongs to him as a private person.

105. Cf Vind c Tyr. (qu. iii, pp. 196sqq.) on Republicae consensu in legislation. Rossaeus (c. 1, § 3) makes the Respublica choose the form of the State and determine quibus velit imperandi et parendi conditionibus circumscribere, and similarly (c. 2, § 11) he makes it able potestatem Regis dilatare, restringere, commutare, penitus abrogare aliamque substituere. According to Mariana (i, c. 9) the King cannot alter the leges universae Republicae voluntate constitutas, nisi universitatibus voluntate certaque sententia. Cf. on this supra, n. 70.

106. Althusius, in his Preface, begins by describing the Respublica vel consociatio universalis as the 'Subject' of the rights of majesty, which belong to this corpus symbioticum in the same sense as we may attribute to it spiritum animatum et cor... quibus sublati corpus illud etiam pereat. The Principis is only an administrator [of the rights of this body], and the true proprietarius et usufructuarius is the populus universus in corpus unum symbioticum ex pluribus minoribus Populus consociationibus consociatus. The Respublica cannot transfer or alienate these rights of majesty, even if it wishes, any more than an individual can share his life with another. At the same time, however—both in this context, and when he subsequently proceeds, in the body of his work, to justify these general principles in detail (cc. 9, 18, 19, 38) and to deal with the several rights of majesty (cc. 10-17)—he identifies this sovereign body which possesses the regni proprietas with the populus; and he identifies the populus in turn with the universa membra consociata or with omnes simul. Similarly he ascribes to the 'People' the property and usufruct in res publicae et fiscales, assigning to the summus magistratus [only] the power of administering them instar tutoris, with such rights as the 'People' has granted (c. 37, §§ 1-2), but in the same breath he describes the Respublica (ibid. §§ 117-18) or the corpus consociatum (c. 17, §§ 1 sqq.) as being the owner.

* Something has gone wrong with Gierke's references here, as he repeats the reference to p. 89 and pp. 114sqq. twice over, for quaesitio ii and quaesitio iii.

*The
persona
Civitatis in Salamonius*

*It is really the same as
the People*

*The Ruler confronts the Respublica
or Populus as something external to it*

107. Salomonius, De principatu (1, pp. 28-9), seeks to prove that Princeps sus legibus ligatur by the help of a distinction, based upon Cicero,* between the Persona Civitatis and the Persona Principis. Since it is the Persona Civitatis which is acting through the Princeps when he issues laws or does any other act of government, the Ruler who obeys his own law submits himself not to himself, but to ea persona quam gerit. It is true that he represents that 'person' [the Persona Civitatis], but he only does so ut gerens [and he does not therefore absorb it into himself]. In reality, both 'persons' act at the same time, but they act in different ways—the Civitas acting ut mandans, and the Princeps ut mandatorius, with the result that the mandans acts ut maior, and the mandatorius ut minister. It follows that it is ipsa Civitas which vere agit et vere leges condit.

But Salomonius always identifies this Civitas [or Persona Civitatis] with the universus populus which creates the Ruler and remains his Superior (pp. 16-28), he treats the leges ab universo populo scriptae as being pacia between the People and the Ruler (pp. 8-16), and he interprets the People itself as a societas, and the Ruler as its praepositus or institor (supra, n. 69). See also his Commentarium, folio 41 verso.

108. It is true that the Ruler is often described as Respublicae pars, and the principle that the whole is greater than the part is often applied in favour of the sovereignty of the People (e.g. in Salomonius, pp. 40-1, and in Mariana, 1, c. 9). But as the 'Subject' of the rights of the Ruler this 'part' leaves the Whole, and is made to form an antithesis to a separately and independently existing personality of the People, of which it is depicted as being the servant, administrator, mandatory or agent, cf. supra n. 104 and n. 107. All the Monarchomachi accordingly insist that the People is prior Rege in time [as well as in importance], and that it only proceeds to erect a ruler, by its own free choice, after it has already constituted itself of Buchanan, pp. 16 ff., p. 69, the Vind. c. Tyr., qu. 11, p. 148 (Rex per populum, propter populum, non sine populo); Rossacus, c. 1, §§ 1-3, Boucher, 1, cc. 105 sqq., Danacus, 1, c. 4, pp. 36-44, Hoenomus, ix, § 5 (populus enim et prior et potior est Monarchus, quippe quos rectores et curatores Respublicae et creat et constitutus). Althusius is particularly emphatic in explaining that the People, (which is tempore prior, and which, as the constituent organ, continues to be prior et superior to the organs which it constitutes) first of all associates itself to form a 'body', and then—but only then—appoints ministri et rectores to avoid the difficulties of getting all its members to meet together. These 'ministers and governors', it is true, universum populum repreäsentant, ejusque personam gerunt in us quae Republicae nomine faciunt, but they remain servi et ministri of the 'associated multitude', and their right of action is derivative (c. 18, §§ 5-15, 26-31, 92-106, c. 19, §§ 2-3, c. 38, §§ 121-2). Even so, however, and even while he thus separates People and ruler as two parts, he also describes the constituent People at the same time (c. 18, § 18) by the style of ipsa Republica [as if it were the Whole].

* Gierke here refers to vol. iii of his Genossenschaftsrecht, p. 24 n. 52.

109. In the Vind c. Tyr the contrast is particularly marked between Populus and Rex as two separate 'persons', who first contract jointly with God, and then form a second contract with one another, on which it follows (1) that the king on his side has a right to take measures of correction against the People, in virtue of the contract made with God, inasmuch as he pledges himself for [the good behaviour of] the People by entering [jointly with it] into that contract (qu. II, pp. 84sqq.), and (2) that he also acquires rights as against the People, in virtue of the contractus mutuo obligatorius which he has made with it, if it becomes seditionis by breach of such contract (qu. III, pp. 260sqq.). A similar view appears in Boucher, I, cc. 18sqq. Danaeus also, in dealing with the relation of the Ruler to the People, applies the idea of contract strictly [to both parties] cf. I, c. 4, pp. 41 (where he speaks of a voluntary 'pact', the violation of which extinguishes rights on both sides), 43, III, c. 6, pp. 214sqq. (so long as the fundamental laws are observed by the Ruler, the People on its side cannot touch the constitution or, more particularly, the royal right of succession, inasmuch as contractus populi cum Principi et ejus familia ab initio quidem fuit voluntatis, postea autem factus est necessitatis, it is only in the event of the Ruler breaking the pact that the People also becomes free, or can proceed to the deposition of the Ruler and his family and an alteration of the constitution). Similar views are to be found in [Beza's] De jure mag qu. 5 and 6 (where the idea of mutua obligatio appears throughout), Hotoman, Francogallia, cc. 13 and 25, Quaest. illust qu. I, Salomonius, I, p. 11, Rossacus, I, c. 1, § 4, c. 2, § 6 (obligatio reciproca) and § 11 (resistance and deposition are only possible ex justa causa): Mariana, I, cc. 6 and 8, Hoenomus, II, § 41 (pactio reipublicae) and IX, §§ 44-54.

In the same way Althusius, while he applies the category of mandatum, is not prevented thereby from treating the commisso regni sive universalis imperii to the supreme magistrate as a contractus, made by reciprocal oaths and entailing reciprocal obligations (cc. 19-20, esp. c. 19, §§ 6-7 and 29sqq.), which confers on the Ruler [as well as on the People] a right that is only forfeited by definite breach of contract (c. 38). He ascribes to the governing authorities full administratio and repreäsentatio of the State-authority, within the limits of the constitution (c. 18, §§ 26sqq.), though he holds, it is true, that if they overstep their 'laws and limits' they cease to be 'ministers of God and the universal association', and are only 'privati . quibus obedientia in illis quibus suae potestatis limites excedunt non debetur' (ibid. §§ 41-6 and 105). He treats the contract of government as a naturally imposed element in the constitution of a State (c. 1, §§ 32-9, c. 18, §§ 20-4), and he seeks to prove its presence in all forms of State (c. 39); but in dealing with democracy he substitutes [for the ordinary contract of ruler and ruled] a contract between the community of the people, which directly exercises the rights of majesty itself, and the bearers of authority who 'represent' it successively from time to time (c. 39, §§ 57-9). See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 144-9.

The theory of contract involves a dualism of People and Ruler

Approximations to Rousseau

110 Some degree of approximation [to Rousseau's theory] is to be found in Buchanan (pp. 168sqq., 488sqq., 788sqq.), who is reproached even by Rossaeus (i, c. 1, §4) with contempt of the right of the Ruler, and still more in Milton, who goes to the length of allowing the deposition of the king by the People, in virtue of the right of self-determination of free-born men, even if there be no other occasion than the wish for a change of the constitution (The Tenure, pp. 148sqq.). But there was no thinker before Rousseau who definitely and in principle denied that there was any contractual relation between the sovereign People and the Ruler; see the author's work on Althusius, pp. 918sqq. [Locke's theory already makes the relation between them not a relation of Contract, but one of Trust. see below, n. 68 to §16.]

111 See Regner Sixtinus, i, c. 1, no. 23; Paurmeister, i, c. 3, no. 10, c. 18, nos. 6-10, c. 23, no. 13, Kirchner, ii, §1, Boxhorn, i, c. 4, §§1-27, Alstedius, pp. 14 and 698sqq., Arumacus, iv, no. 2, Otto, ii, no. 14, §§17-19, Brautlach, iii, c. 2, §§5-9, Bortius, De natura iur. maj. c. 1, §2, c. 2, §16, c. 5, §9, c. 6, §§1-2, Besold, De maj. s. 1, c. 1, Tuldén, i, cc. 11-12, Werdenhagen, iii, c. 2, §§7-9, Liebenthal, vii, §§3-13, Frantzken, De pot. princ. §§19-22 and 92-101, Carpzov, Comm. in leg. reg. c. 1, § 14, c. 13, s. 1, Lumnacius, Jus publ. i, c. 10, no. 14, Capitul. p. 532, nos. 48-79, Berckringer, i, c. 4, §10 see also the author's Genossenschaftsrecht, iv, pp. 2168sqq. [not here translated] and his work on Althusius, pp. 1658sqq., nn. 124-9

112 We may trace such a feeling in Bortius (c. 5, §9), where he describes the tota Respublica et secundario ordines et status Regni as the subjectum absolutum Majestatis, and the King, in so far as regimen translatum est, as the subjectum limitatum. It may also be seen in Besold (De maj. s. 1, c. 1, §4) nunquam censendum est totum et universam Rempublicam per Principem reprezentari; caput est, non totum corpus, et quomodo in corpore humano etiam aliarum partium functiones sunt, ita et adhuc corporis publici et populi aliqua est Majestas (Berckringer says the same, almost word for word, i, c. 4, §10.) Compare also the attempt made by Fichlau (in Conring, Opera, iii, pp. 9768sqq.) to interpret the doctrine of Althusius as if majesty were ascribed by him to the body of the whole association only ratione fundamentis et radicaliter [i.e. in theory, and not in practice].

118. In Paurmeister, for example, we often find the summa potestas, which in the passages quoted above in n. 111 he assigns to the Respublica or Imperium, also ascribed to the populus or universus populus (i, c. 17, nos. 18sqq., c. 19, nos. 68sqq., ii, c. 1, no. 11). Kirchner (ii, §1) vindicates 'real majesty' for the societas populi coalita, Boxhorn (i, c. 5) attributes the majesty of the Respublica also to the populus, Alstedius (p. 18) ascribes sovereignty to the populus or subditus universi, and Bortius, while he generally vindicates it for the Respublica, gives it equally in cc. 5, 6 and 7 to the populus. Besold and Tuldén also identify the Respublica, as the 'Subject' of 'real majesty', with the community of the people, indeed, they even identify the Respublica with omnes singuli, when they are distinguishing it [as the possessor of 'real majesty'] from the democratic authority possessing 'personal majesty' (n. 43 supra). Lumnacius, loc. cit., expressly describes the Respublica, which continues to remain in possession of 'real majesty' after the creation of a 'personal majesty', as being the universitas or universus populus (see supra, n. 69). Werdenhagen (i, c. 6) and Berckringer (i, c. 4, §§6-10) describe the 'Subject' of 'real majesty', which they sometimes call by the name of Respublica and sometimes by that of Populus, as collectivum (supra, n. 67).

Idea of the State itself as the true Sovereign

'Real majesty' ascribed to the Respublica
or Populus

114. Thus the Respublica or Populus, as the 'Subject' of real majesty, is generally held to possess (1) the right of originally appointing the Ruler, which comes into force again in the event of the extinction or forfeiture of the powers of the authorised Ruler, (2) the right of fixing and maintaining the conditions of the contract between ruler and ruled, and (3) the right of consenting to constitutional changes and alienations of territory. It is also, as a rule, held to possess (4) the right of resistance to, and deposition of, a Ruler who has broken the contract, and (5), in addition, all other rights which are reserved by special provision when 'personal majesty' is vested in the Ruler. See particularly Bortius, on the distinction between jura regn and jura regia (c. 1, §2), on the various jura regn which ad ipsam Rempublicam, or ad populum, spectant (c. 2), and on the several jura regia sui regalia in detail (c. 3). See also Paurmeister, I, cc. 19, 21, 22, 23 and 30, Besold, De maj. § 1, c. 1, §§5-8, c. 6, §2, § 3, cc. 2 and 7, Tulden, I, c. 11, Arumacius, loc. cit., Limnaeus, loc. cit., Berckringer, I, c. 4, §8.

The particular rights involved in real majesty

115. Cf. Besold, De maj. § 1, c. 1, §7, where a distinction is drawn between the 'patrimony of the King' and the 'demeane of the Kingdom' as regards the latter, nuda proprietas est penes Universitatem populi sui Rempublicam, usufructus autem penes Regem, and therefore there can be no alienation without the consent of the People. See also Berckringer, I, c. 4, §8 the ownership of the demesne, as the dos Regni, is vested in the universus populus, but the usufruct belongs to the imperans. Cf. also Bortius, I, c. 2, §16.

State property belongs to the owner of real majesty

116. This is particularly emphasised with regard to changes in fundamental law, or in the territory of the State (Besold, § 1, c. 1, §§5 and 7, Tulden, I, c. 11, Bortius, c. 2, §§14-21), and in regard to the choice of a new ruler (Bortius, c. 2, §§3-13) and the deposition of a tyrannical ruler. For the right of deposition of the tyrannical ruler, see Boxhorn, II, c. 4, §§45sqq and Dirigunt polit. c. 3, Hilliger in Arumacius, II, no. 13, c. 9, Frantzen, ibid. IV, no. 42, §§92-101, Brautlach, Epit. VIII, c. 5, Limnaeus, loc. cit., Berckringer, I, c. 5, and Bortius, c. 7, who argues that contrariatur majestatis, si Princeps in perniciem et ruinam Rempublicam abutitur potestate, contra quod remedium est ut resistat populus et, si opus, deponat eundem; for since the Princeps eo ordine, in et jure admisus est, ut salutem Rep. procuraret, dissoluntur obligatio et hoc solo casu populus poterit The same general theory [which is applied to the tyrannical ruler] is also applied by Bortius to the case of a breach of pacta expressa.

The owner of real majesty as controlling the owner of personal majesty

117. The right of the Ruler to public power and public property was often conceived as a dingliches Recht *. Cf. R. Sixtinus, I, c. 1, no. 38 (quasi propria), Paurmeister, I, c. 18, nos. 6-10 (dominium verum et plenum in all rights of government belongs to the People, but the dominium while, the usufructus and the other jura realia innomina belong to the Ruler), Limnaeus, loc. cit. (usufructus). According to Berckringer (I, c. 4, §§6-7) the People abandons the 'exercise' of majesty privative, but retains the 'substance' cumulative, whether we regard it as retaining that substance ratione juris et proprietatis, or whether we apply the analogy of a case of 'letting' or locatio (there can be no question of 'selling' or venditio)†. In §8, however, Berckringer simply says that the

Personal majesty as a proprietary right

* I.e. not as a right arising from the obligation to him of others, but as a proprietary right belonging to him per se, and therefore prior to obligation.

† I.e. the people as a whole retains the substance of majesty either in the simple sense of being owner, or in the sort of sense in which a person letting out property still retains a 'substance' though he has let out the control.

two 'majesties' are related to one another as dominium is to usufructus. Otto (§§ 18-19) regards the Ruler as only administrator.

118. On the varieties in the treatment of majestas personalis see the author's work on Althusius, pp. 168-71.

119. The statement of Berckringer (I, c. 4, § 7) is obscure. He makes the people, by creating a 'personal majesty', cease to be a persona actu, but continue to remain a persona potesta, immo actu, sed possibil. It is equally difficult to detect any clear meaning in § 20, where he deduces from the 'real majesty' of the Res publica contrahens the conclusion that the People, after erecting a Ruler, has still no Superior realiter, though it has one personaliter.

120. See the writer's work on Althusius, p. 171.

121. This is the conception which Grotius applies in dealing with the acquisition of political authority by the voluntary or enforced subjection of a people (I, c. 3, §§ 8-13, II, c. 5, § 31, III, c. 8), with the alienation of political authority, or some particular political right of government or property, whether by the Ruler or the People, or by both together (II, c. 6, §§ 3-14, III, c. 20, § 5), with the loss of political authority (II, c. 9), with the right of resistance to that authority (II, c. 4), and with the obligation of the People in virtue of contracts concluded by the Ruler (II, c. 14; III, c. 20, § 6). Cf. supra, notes 54, 66-7, 70, 89-90, 97.

122. Cf. I, c. 3, §§ 8-9. It is a mistaken theory that suprema potestas always belongs to the People, for the people can alienate or forfeit its original sovereignty just as much as an individual can alienate or forfeit his liberty. There is also error in the theory of those qui mutant quendam subjectionem subfingunt, ut populus universus regi recte imperanti parere debeat, rex autem male imperans populo subiiciatur. See also II, c. 4, §§ 1-7, c. 5, § 31, III, c. 8.

123. II, c. 9, § 8 the people is the same whether it is ruled regio vel plurimum vel multis in unius imperio, nor does it change its identity if, having been before sua iuria, it afterwards becomes subject plenissimo jure. Nam imperium quod in rege est ut in capite, in populo manet ut in toto, cuius pars est caput, atque adeo rege, si electus est, aut regis familia extincta, jus imperandi ad populum reddit. Consequently, non desinit debere pecuniam populus, rege sibi imposito, quam liber debebat, est enim idem populus, et dominum retinet eorum quae populi fuerant, immo et imperium in se retinet, quamquam iam non exercendum a corpore sed a capite. For the same reason 'he who has received supreme power over a people previously free' must hold the same position in [international] conferences as that held before by the people itself sic, vicissim, qui regis fuerat locus eum populus liber implebit. Cf. also II, c. 6, § 16 contracts made with a free people are always pacta realia . quia subiectum est res permanens .. immo etiam status ciuitatis in regnum mutetur, manebit fideus, quia manet idem corpus eti si mutato capite, et ut supra diximus imperium quod per regem exercetur non desinit esse imperium populi.

124. He always speaks only of 'people' and 'king', and, somewhat astonishingly, he never finds room for any technical employment of the expressions subiectum commune et proprium.

The manner in which Grotius sets on one side the opposite views of Aristotle* is peculiar (II, c. 9, § 8). Like other 'artificial things', he argues, the

The People to Grotius merely an aggregate

Grotius limits popular sovereignty

Grotius on the continuity of the State

Grotius on Aristotle's view of the continuity of the State

* Gierke here refers to vol. III of his Genossenschaftsrecht, p. 21. For Aristotle's own views on the question, 'When is a State the same', see Politica, III, c. 3 (1276a 8-1276b 15). Actually the interpretation of these views by Grotius seems to be more accurate than Gierke's interpretation. Aristotle, as W. L. Newman says (vol. III of his edition, p. 149), 'decides that after any change of constitution the State is not

State may be considered from different points of view civitas species una est consociatio juris et imperii, altera relatio partum inter se earum quae regunt et quae reguntur; hanc specialis Politicus, illam Juriconsultus. Aristotle only spoke as a student of politics, and he therefore did not attempt to solve the question of the continuance of a public liability, because it belonged to ars altera Grotius' mistaken conception of the argument of Aristotle (who clearly denies the existence of a public liability himself, and only leaves as an open question the appeal to legal opinion) is obvious. It is interesting, however, to notice that Grotius vindicates the 'social' [or partnership] conception of the State for jurisprudence, and the 'governmental' for political science, and that he places himself among the jurists.

125. Even in dealing with the question whether acts of the Ruler are binding on his successors, Grotius, although he speaks (cf. n. 89 supra) of commune an intervening obligation of the civitas, makes no use of his conception of subjectum commune; he applies instead the different idea of the Ruler's having a collective authority [because he represents the collective people] which has the effect of obliging the community at large cf. also n. 90 supra The never active

126 In wars, agreements and treaties of peace it is not States as such which are involved, but their sovereigns—'those who have supreme power in the State' (i, c. 3, §4, II, c. 15, §3, III, c. 30, §2). Accordingly we often find Rex and Populus liber mentioned as alternatives (e.g. II, c. 6, §7, c. 9, §§8-9, c. 6, §16 and §31, III, c. 30, §§3-4), but we also find Rex vel Civitas mentioned as alternatives with the same meaning (e.g. II, c. 15, §16) Externally

127 See supra, n. 66. Grotius ascribes dominium emmuni to the Civitas, cf. i, c. 3, §6—dominium emmuni, quod civitas habet in cives et res civium ad usum publicum cf. also II, c. 14, §7 and III, c. 20, §7—res subditorum sub eminenti domino esse Civitatis, ita ut Civitas, vel qui Civitatis vice fungitur, us rebus ut easque etiam perdere et alienare possit. But here again, what he understands by Civitas is the community of the people, and he therefore holds that while the question of compensation concerns the relation of Civitas et singuli, the question of confiscation ex justa causa concerns only the relation of Rex et subditi (III, c. 20, §10). Cf. also II, c. 3, §19, on the possible reversion of land without an owner ad universitatem aut ad dominum superiorem. Or internally

128 Cf. I, c. 3, §§8 and 11, c. 4, §8, II, c. 9, §8. There may even be reges sub populo, but they are not true kings

129 Cf. I, c. 3, §§11-15, II, c. 6, §3, III, c. 8, §1, c. 20, §5

130 III, c. 8, §1. A conqueror may also institute at will intermediate stages between the two extremes of subjectio mere civilis and subjectio mere rights of herilis. He can also abolish the conquered State entirely, and turn it either into a province or a magna familia (§2). Along with his right over the universitas, he also acquires the res universitatis and its incorporalia iura, inasmuch as qui dominus est personarum, idem est rerum est et iurius omnis quod personis competit. It follows that, even when he leaves a conquered people in possession of the ius civitatis, he can take away from the civitas, or leave to it, as much of its property and its rights as he likes (§4). On the application of the *ius postlimium to a people, see III, c. 9, §9, and on the moral limits to the right of conquest, see III, c. 15 Grotius on conquest

the same, but that the question as to the fulfilment of contracts is a separate one'. In other words, Aristotle (just as Grotius says) only makes a pronouncement on the political question, and leaves the juridical question alone, as λόγος ἔργου

* The right of returning to a former status and resuming former privileges.

181. i, c. 3, § 13: at in regnis quae populi voluntate delata sunt, concedo non esse praesumendum eam fuisse populi voluntatem, ut alienatio imperii sui regi permetteretur

Grotius on
the People as owner of political authority

182. i, c. 3, § 11, ii, c. 6, § 3, iii, c. 20, § 5. In such a case, therefore, [i.e. where the King is king by contract,] it is the people only, and not the king, who can alienate right over the State or any part thereof. At the same time, the people can only do so accidentes consensu regis, quia si quoque jus aliquod habet, quale usufructarius, quod modo auferri non debet (i, c. 6, § 3), and further the consent of the part of the people concerned is also necessary when it is a question of alienating a part of a State (ibid. § 4). Even alienations which are necessary and advantageous do not form an exception [to the rule that popular consent is required]; but here we may take the mere fact of silence as consent (§ 8). The same is also true of the granting of enfeoffments and mortgages (§ 9). The Ruler cannot even alienate any of the lesser rights of government (minores functiones civiles), so that they become the inheritable rights of the recipient, unless the people expressly concurs, or tacitly gives authority by developing a customary rule to that effect (§ 10). The co-operation of the people is also necessary for regulations about a regency or the succession to the throne (i, c. 3, § 15). If the Ruler seeks to carry into effect alienations which are invalid, the people has a right of resistance (i, c. 4, § 10), and it also possesses this right in other cases in the last resort (ibid. § 11).

183. ii, c. 6, § 7 territorium et totum et eius partes sunt communia populi pro indusso a liber populus, or Rex intercedens populi consensu, can alienate without question uninhabited parts of the territory.

184. ii, c. 6, §§ 11-13, iii, c. 20, § 5. The principle [of the people's ownership of State-property] carries the consequence that patrimonium populi, cuius fructus destinati sunt ad sustentanda reipublicae aut regiae dignitatis onera, a regibus alienari nec in totum nec in partem potest. Res modicæ constitute no exception, except that here it is easier to argue from the people's knowledge and silence to its consent. On the other hand, the king may, as fructarius, dispose of the income, and he may also mortgage effectively where, and in so far as, he has a right of imposing taxes by his own action [i.e. if the king can tax any property by his own action to get resources, he may also mortgage that property by his own action for the same purpose]

185. i, c. 3, §§ 8, 11, 16, 18, c. 4, §§ 12, 14, ii, c. 14, § 2. Grotius distinguishes two sorts of limitation [on the Ruler], according as it affects (1) only the executio, or (2) ipsa facultas, and according, therefore, as action contrary to the limitation (1) is simply illegal or (2) is null and void. Even limitations of the latter sort [i.e. limitations on ipsa facultas, which make any action exceeding the limits null and void] do not involve any diminution of the Ruler's sovereignty, because the annihilation of his 'faculty' proceeds non ex superioris, sed ipso iure. Nor is any division of sovereignty produced by a stipulation in favour of popular consent to laws, taxes, etc. Even the addition of a lex commissoria, by which the sovereignty devolved on the Ruler must in certain cases be counted as forfeit, and must therefore give way to the original sovereignty of the People, does not eliminate the exclusive sovereignty of the Ruler during his tenure.

186. The case is different, according to i, c. 3, § 11, where rule is only vested in the Ruler as a precarum [i.e. as a thing of which the use only is granted, for a period determined by the will of the grantor].

Grotius on
the People
as owner of State
property

Grotius on the possible limitations of the Ruler

187 i, c 3, §§ 17–20. Sumnum imperium, although it is unum ac per se in divisiblem, is none the less divisible into potentiales and subjectae partes, and there is an actual divisio summatiss between king and people if the people, in the fundamental contract, has reserved some of the rights of government, or has reserved a power of enforcement [of the conditions, or some of the conditions, of the contract] Cf i, c 4, § 13· there is a jus resistendi if the king, in a case of divided imperium, encroaches on 'the part belonging to the people or senate'.

188 Cf vol. iv [of the Genossenschaftsrecht, not here translated], p 217 n. 44, on Lampadius and Scharschmidt cf also the author's work on Althusius, p 175 n 157

189. Cf ibid. pp 175–6.

140 F. Victoria (iii, no 7) ascribes original sovereignty to the Respublica. Causa vero materialis, in qua hujusmodi potestas residet, jure naturali et divino est ipsa Respublica, cui de se competit gubernare seipsum et administrare et omnes potestates suas in communem bonum dirigere He argues that, even after the transference of this sovereignty, the Ruler is still bound by his own laws, because he is himself pars Respublicae, and his laws are to be regarded 'as if they had been passed by the whole Respublica' (no 23) But he expressly identifies this Respublica with the multitude, which is incapable of exercising political authority itself (no 8); he places the king super totam Rerpublicam, and thereby also super omnes simul (no. 15), and he thus makes the active 'person' of the State always resident in the Ruler (cf also no 11)

Vasquez ascribes to the populus both original sovereignty, and, in cases of doubt, a right of co-operation in legislation and alienations of territory, which arises from a reservation to be supposed in the act of transferring original sovereignty (cc 42–3 and 47), but he describes ipsa Respublica as the 'Subject' of a right of resistance to a monarch who breaks his contract (c. 8)

According to Soto, the Respublica has the jus seipsum regendi, but 'by divine instruction' it transfers that right—retaining however (along with other rights) the right of deposing a monarch who has become tyrannical ['in exercise'] The Respublica, which is really nothing more nor less than the sum of omnes, is incapable by itself of exercising its sovereignty, and only by transferring sovereignty does it become a body which has also a head and is therefore capable of action The result is that the Ruler non solum singulis reipublicae membris superior est, verum et totus collectum corporis caput, totum adeo supereminens, ut totam etiam simul posse possit (i, qu 1, a 3, qu 7, a 2, iv, qu 4, a. 1–2). Cf Covarruvias, i, c 1, and Bellarmine, De laicis, c 6 (Respublica non potest per semetipsam exercere hanc potestatem).

Molina definitely supposes two 'persons' in the State—the People and the Ruler. He reserves the name of Respublica for the community of the People, although he admits that the Ruler possesses sovereignty. The Respublica, he argues, originally has all authority (ii, d. 22, §9) it transfers it secundum arbitrium and on such conditions as it thinks fit (ii, d. 23, §§ 1–sqq); and it recovers it, by right of reversion, if the Rulership be vacated or forfeit (v, d. 3). It preserves, in cases of doubt, the right of approving laws (ii, d. 23, §§ 6–7) it also preserves the right of property in the bona Regni, so that the Ruler cannot alienate any of them, just as he cannot divide the kingdom or surrender it to foreigners non consentiente Respublica ipsa, or, again, alter the constitution or the succession to the throne (ii, d. 25). The Respublica has a right of resistance to tyrants; it can, quoad capita, condonare, and depose or division of Imperium*

*Grotius on

The views of Catholic writers on the natural rights of the People against the Ruler

punish the tyrant 'by the express will of its whole body' (iii, d. 6, v, d. 3, §2). None the less, Rex est superior tota Res publica [within the terms of the authority granted to him], and he is subject to no real jus deponendi, since (1) the Res publica can only proceed against him when he 'assumes a power not granted to him', and (2) when he does so, and thus acts outside the terms of the 'grant', neither he nor the people is Superior (ii, d. 23, §§8-10).

Suarez regularly describes the communitas, populus, totum corpus, or hominum collectio, as the 'Subject' of original sovereignty, and also of the rights of transferring and recovering that sovereignty (iii, cc. 2-4) and of the reserved rights of the people which are never transferred at all (iii, c. 9, no. 4, iv, c. 19, v, c. 17), and he opposes this Group-person, as the Regnum or Res publica, to the Ruler. Accordingly he terms the contract of subjection a pactum inter Regnum et Regem (iii, c. 4, no. 5), he speaks of a consensus Regis to laws (iv, c. 19, no. 6), and he vindicates for the Regnum or tota Res publica a right of insurrection against a king who has become a tyrant 'in exercise', arguing that, though the people has transferred to him a real ownership of political authority, it has added the condition ut politice non tyrannice regnet—so that, while in his essence Rex superior est Regno, a contingency may arise in which tota Res publica superior est Regis (iii, c. 4, no. 6, c. 10, nos. 7-10, Opus de tripli virtute, pp. 1055-6).

See, in addition, nn. 62 and 67 supra, on the 'collective' conception of the personality of the people in the writers mentioned.

The Ruler limited by the contractual rights of the People

141 Cf Waremund de Erenbergk, De regni subsidio, c. 11, p. 150; Bornitus, De maij c. 9 (leges fundamentales et pacta cum populo), c. 13 (where it is argued that the administration of parts of majesty may be devolved, so that an imperium moderatum takes the place of summum imperium absolutum), and Part. pp. 42-3 and 102sqq., Friderisch, cc. 18 and 29 (on the possible limitation and restriction of the exercise of the supreme power by certain actiones), Keckermann, i, c. 33, pp. 531-2 (on special pacts with subjects, which restrict but do not abolish monarchy), Busius, ii, c. 7. See also Molina, ii, d. 23, and Suarez, iii, c. 4, no. 5, c. 9, no. 4, iv, c. 17 (the Ruler may be limited in the exercise of supreme power, in legislation, in taxation, etc., by a translatio sub conditione, for such a conditional transference is a conventio inter communiam et principem, et ideo potestas recepta non excedit modum donationis vel conventionis).

142. We find this dualism in Arnisaies (Polit. c. 8, §§38sqq.; De rep. ii, c. 6, s. 1, De jure maj. ii, c. 1, §1) 'majesty' is summum individuum, non indivisibile. summum potentiale, non essentiale it contains 'parts', viz. the 'rights of majesty', and though it cannot, sumum s. mta cum omnibus suis partibus, belong to a number of persons, secerit, et divisum inter plures distribui, possunt.

The mixed constitution is interpreted by most of its adherents in the same sense of a real [and not merely conceptual] division of powers. cf for example, Grotius in n. 137 supra, Heider, pp. 982sqq., Werdenhagen, ii, c. 25, Lumnæus, Jus publicum, i, c. 10, Schönborner, i, c. 16, Keckermann, ii, cc. 4-6, Liebenthal, viii, qu. 1, Berckranger, i, c. 5, §7 and c. 12, §§15-21, Felwinger, Diss. pp. 417sqq. But the 'person' of the Ruler still remains a divided 'person' when the essence of the mixed constitution is held to consist merely in a division of majesty into ideal [or conceptual] parts, cf. Paurmeister, ii, c. 1 (cf. vol. iv of the Genossenschaftsrecht [not here translated], p. 218); Besold, De statu resp. mixtis, c. 1, Tulden, ii, cc. 16-17, Carpzov,

Division of the mixed constitution as affecting sovereignty

Comment in leg. reg. c. 13, § 9, nos. 28–31. We find, however, in Besold, op. cit., and still more decidedly in Frantzken, De statu resp. mixto, an approximation to the view that the partners who share supreme power only constitute the person of the Ruler when they are taken conjunctione. Cf. also Suarez, III, c. 4, no. 5, IV, c. 17, no. 4 and c. 19, no. 6 where the king needs the consensus Regni in publicis comitiis for his laws, the 'supreme legislator' is not the king by himself, but Rex cum Regno. Other thinkers only speak vaguely of a common capacity for the rights of majesty of Busius, II, c. 6, and also L. de Hartog, A Dutch Writer on the State at the Beginning of the Seventeenth Century (in an offprint from Nieuwe bijdragen voor rechtsgeleerdheid en wetgeving, 1882), pp. 24 sqq and 33.

143 Bodin, I, c. 8 and II, c. 1, and especially the argument (in nos. 85–99) that any constitutional limitation of the true Ruler by the rights of the universitas populi is unthinkable, because it at once makes the universitas populi itself the Ruler.

144 Bodin, VII, c. 2, nos. 640–1 (where there is a comparison of the Respublica to a minor). Cf. also vol. IV of the Genossenschaftsrecht [not here translated], p. 249 n. 156.

145 Gregorius, although he has a doctrine of the Sovereignty of the Ruler which makes it single, immutable, indivisible, and irresponsible (I, c. 1, § 9, V, c. 1, § 3, VI, cc. 1–3, XXIV, c. 7, XXVI, c. 5, §§ 24–5 and c. 7), none the less makes a sharp division between bona Respublicae and bona patrimonialia Principis, and he will only describe the former as being, at the very most, quasi propria Principis (III, cc. 2–3 and Synagma, III, c. 2, §§ 8–10). He also allows the possibility of a limitation of supreme power per legem electionis (III, c. 7).

Bornitus, again, while he assigns the 'person of the State' decisively to the Ruler—by whom alone Respublica statum adipiscitur et conservatur (Part. p. 45, De may c. 5), and who stands above the People, even when they are regarded as a community, in virtue of being the 'Subject' of a single and indivisible majesty (Part. pp. 47 sqq., De may cc. 3 and 11)—at the same time refuses, like Gregorius, to recognise the Ruler's right of property in bona Respublicae (Part. pp. 70 sqq.), and regards limitations of absolute power as possible (supra, n. 141).

Keckermann goes to the length of allowing the possibility of resistance and deposition even against the absolute Imperans, though he makes the exercise of these rights more difficult in that case than it is against the Monarcha certis pactis et conditionibus assumptus (I, c. 28, p. 431).

According to Claudio de Carnin, Regia potestas and Respublicae potestas are identical (I, c. 10), inasmuch as by natural law the Respublica necessarily transfers, without any reservation, the whole of the power which rested originally in itself (I, c. 9), but the acceptatio populi continues to be necessary for legislation (I, c. 3).

Barclay [unlike these thinkers] recognises no rights of any description as belonging to the People. According to his argument every true monarchy is absolute, and its existence is incompatible with any limitations, or any division of power, imposed by fundamental law (II, IV, V, c. 12). All the rights of the People are transferred, and thereby cease to belong to the People (IV, c. 10, VI). universa negotia Respublicae demandantur Regi (IV, c. 25); there is never any right of resistance or deposition (III, cc. 4–16, V, cc. 7–8). In Barclay, however, there is no question of any theoretical construction of a State-personality [i.e. he does not get beyond the conception of the personal

Even the absolutists suppose a personality of the People

Arrianus on the Ruler
and the societas of the ruled

king to a conception of the impersonal 'persona Curiatus', which might have involved him in problems of the relations of the king to this persona].

146. Cf Polit c. 6, De rep 1, prooem §§4sqq. and c. 5, s. 3-5. He thus assumes that, when the form of the State is changed, the Respublica disappears but the Civitas remains, and he states the question which Aristotle raised in connection with such changes* in the form, 'Quatenus acta Respublicas obligent Civitatem?' His conclusion is that 'contracts made by the Respublica only' do not bind 'the whole Civitas' on the other hand 'contracts made by the whole people', and 'agreements made and expenses incurred for the welfare of the Civitas' (in regard to which the 'tacit consent of the people' is to be assumed) continue to hold good 'if the Respublica disappears'. He also contrasts the personality of the People with that of the Ruler in other connections, and, more particularly, he refuses to include within the scope of the Ruler's 'majesty' the right of property in the territory and belongings of the State (De jure maj. III, c. 1). But he entirely excludes the People as such from all the rights of the Respublica (De rep. II, c. 2, s. 5, c. 3, s. 8; Polit c. 14; De auct. principum in populum, cc. 2-3, De jure maj. I, cc. 3, 6), and he accordingly holds that where a monarch is limited by the constitutional rights of the People, there is no longer any question of a true monarchy, but only of a forma mixta (De auct. etc. c. 1, §§4sqq., De jure maj. I, c. 6). It follows that the Respublica, which includes and connotes the whole authority of the State (De rep. I, c. 5, s. 3), is identical with the Ruler, and the 'person' of the Respublica can therefore be also expressed by a personification of his majestas or dignitas (De rep. I, c. 5, s. 4, De maj. III, cc. 1 and 9). More especially, the immortality of his dignitas serves as a means of securing the continuity of the Respublica in the event of a change in the line of succession 'So far as the rights of majesty and the status imperii are concerned', the successor to the throne is bound by the contracts (though not by the decrees) of his predecessors, where such contracts have been made nomine dignitatis, et pro Republica, in regard to matters appertaining to the dignity itself, but 'in matters appertaining to the fisc' [i.e. to his own private treasury, as distinct from the public funds], he is only responsible as heir (De jure maj. I, c. 7). Between the 'person' of the State or Respublica, as thus conceived, and that of the People, there may be an obligatio inaequalis, but there can be no really effective contractual relation (ibid. c. 6).

147. De cive, c. 5, Leviathan, c. 14, c. 17. tanquam si unusquisque unusquisque diceret Ego huius homini, vel huius coetui, auctoritatem et jus meum regendi mihi ipsum concedo, ea condicione, ut tu quoque tuam auctoritatem et jus tuum tu regendi in eundem transferas Cf the author's work on Althusius, pp. 86sqq., 101sqq., and for different conceptions see pp. 341sqq.

148 De cive, c. 6, §1, c. 7; Leviathan, c. 19. In particular he argues that the assembled people, even when it wishes to retain supreme power, cannot continue to be a 'person' unless it immediately transforms itself into a conclavis regularly meeting and deciding questions by a majority-vote, which involves a devolution by all and single of their whole personality, through a mutual contract, upon the democratic Ruler as una persona (De cive, c. 7, §§5-7). In an aristocracy, the constitution of a curia optimatum to rule as 'a single person' means that the people immediately 'ceases to exist as a single person' (ibid. §8), and is 'at that moment dissolved' (§9), 'being no more version of contract

Hobbes'

Hobbes
rejects the idea of the People as a 'person'

* See supra, n. 124.

a single person, but a dissolute multitude' (§ 10). Similarly, if a monarch be chosen, populus statim atque id factum est persona esse desunt (§§ 12, 16).

149. De cive, c. 6, § 20, c. 7, §§ 7, 9, 12, 14, 17; Leviathan, c. 19. The monarch in a monarchy, the Senate in an aristocracy, and the majority of the people in a democracy, are all omni obligatione liberi, they are not bound by any contracts made with individual subjects or with the whole body of subjects. They are not even pledged by any oath they may have taken. They cannot therefore do injustice to their subjects, either as individuals or as a whole. Any reservation of the rights of the People in a democracy, by means of a contract made at the time of the institution of the Ruler, is inconceivable, because the People was not a person before the establishment of the principle of majority-rule, and the only contract which was possible at that time was merely a contract between individuals and individuals. A similar reservation in an aristocracy, or a monarchy, would be null and void, because the people receiving the promise [that its reserved rights will be observed] disappears as a person with the institution of the aristocratic or monarchical Ruler, 'and when a person disappears, all obligation to that person disappears also'. A contract between the Ruler, after he has been instituted, and the People, is impossible, because all that then remains over against the sovereign is merely a 'dissolute multitude'. Nor can any legal nexus of any sort exist as between the Ruler and his individual subjects, because the will of individuals has been merged entirely in the sovereign will.

150. De cive, c. 5, § 11, c. 6, §§ 4–20, c. 7, c. 12, §§ 1–7, c. 13, c. 14, §§ 20–33; Leviathan, cc. 18, 19, 21, 23, 30.

151. De cive, c. 6, §§ 17–19, c. 7, §§ 4 and 15–17, c. 12, § 5; Leviathan, cc. 18, 29.

152. See supra, nn. 84, 86, 87.

153. Hobbes' account of the similarity and difference between the monarchical and the republican sovereign illustrates particularly how much he identifies the 'personality' of the Ruler with the physical substance of a man or a body of men. The republican sovereign only really exists for him as long as it is actually in session in the interval it sleeps, and this sleep becomes death if the right of meeting at its own discretion be lost. Cf. De cive, c. 7, §§ 6, 10, 13 and Leviathan, c. 19, and especially De cive, c. 7, § 16, with the acute deductions in regard to temporary monarchies which are derived from this principle.

154. De cive, c. 5, §§ 6–11; Leviathan, c. 17. This contract is more than a 'consent or concord' it is a real union of persons, in personam unam vere omnium uno. By it 'the wills of all are reduced to one' . ut unus homo vel unus coetus Personam generalis unusquisque singularis, utque unusquisque auctorem se fateatur esse actionum omnium, quas egerit Persona illa, eisque voluntate et iudicio voluntatem suam submitteret

155. De cive, c. 5, §§ 9–10, 11, c. 6, § 1; Leviathan, cc. 16–18, 22. Hobbes declares absurd the opinion of those who say, 'of Kings bearing the Person of the State', *quod etsi singulis maiores, universi tamen minores sunt; nam si per universos intelligent Civitatis Personam, ipsum intelligent Regem, itaque Rex seipso minor erit, quod est absurdum, sin per universos multitudinem intelligent solitam, singulis intelligent, itaque Rex, qui major singulis est, major quoque erit universi, quod iterum est absurdum. Most thinkers are, however, in Hobbes' view, unable to see how Civitas in Persona Regis continetur (Leviathan, c. 18).

* See the statement of this argument in the English version of the Leviathan, c. 18, at the beginning of the third paragraph from the end of the chapter.

Hobbes
refuses to admit a contract of Ruler and People

Sovereignty to Hobbes a physical fact

The Sovereign
as plenary Representatio

The People without a Ruler a mere multitude

156. Hobbes is never tired of drawing out the distinction between a community constituted as a person and 'a dissolute multitude to which no action or right can be assigned', or of describing the people without a Ruler as a mere 'multitude' [cf. De cive, c. 6, §§ 1-3 and 20, c. 7, §§ 5, 10, 16, 18; Leviathan, cc. 16, 18, 19]. He will not even allow the name of 'people' to be applied to such a body, and he remarks (De cive, c. 12, § 8) that it is a mark of revolutionary opinion quod homines non satis distinguuntur inter populum et multitudinem. The 'people' is a unity with a single will and activity the 'multitude' is not. The 'people' rules in every form of State, and even in a monarchy (for 'the people wills by the will of one man'): the 'multitude', in all forms, means the subjects. In Democraha et Aristocrata cives sunt multitudo, sed curia est populus; et in Monarcha subditus sunt multitudo, et (quamquam paradoxum sit) Rex est populus. If, following the vulgar use of language, we call the masses by the name of 'people'—if we speak of (what is totally impossible) a rebellion of the civitas contra regem, and describe the will of discontented subjects as 'the will of the people'—we are invoking, sub praetextu populi, cives contra civitatem, hoc est multitudinem contra populum.

The Ruler as soul of the body politic

157. De cive, c. 6, § 19 the usual comparison of the Ruler to the head is false, a comparison of him to the soul is the only proper comparison, because the soul is the instrument of the will, and it is through the instrumentality of him qui summum habet imperium, et non aliter, that 'the State has will', et potest velle et nolle. The chief council is a better analogy to the head; cf. Leviathan, Introduction and c. 19.

Hobbes on the personality of the State

158. Cf. supra, notes 100 and 101; De cive, c. 5, §§ 9, 12, c. 6, § 1, c. 12, § 8, Leviathan, cc. 17-19. Hobbes' very definition of the State already includes the attribute of personality. In the De cive, c. 5, § 9 (after an account of the institution of a 'civil person' by means of a union of wills, and an explanation of how this 'person' differs from individuals, and even from omnes simul, si excipiamus eum cuius voluntas sit pro voluntate omnium) we get the definition: Civitas ergo (ut eam definimus) est persona una, cuius voluntas ex pactis plurorum hominum pro voluntate habenda est ipsorum omnium, ut singulorum viribus et facultatibus uti possit ad pacem et defensionem omnium. A similar definition also occurs in the Leviathan, c. 17. Here, after giving an account of the contract made at the time of the State's foundation, he continues, quo facto multitudo illa una Persona est, et vocatur Civitas et Respublica, atque haec generatio est magna illius Leviathan vel—ut dignus loquar—mortalis Dei, cui pacem et protectionem sub Deo immortali debemus omnem. Then follows the definition—'A State is one person, of whose actions a great number of men have made themselves authors by mutual agreements one with another, to the end that he should use the power of them all at his own will for peace and common defence'.

Contemporary views similar to those of Hobbes

159. About the same time as Hobbes (1642) Graszwinkel developed an absolutist theory of indivisible and illimitable 'majesty' (potestas una, summa in se, et absoluta) which held the same position in the State as God in the Universe or the soul in the body, and excluded any independent right in any other part of the State [cf. n. 93 supra]. But Graszwinkel failed to attain the conception of a single and homogeneous State-personality, and his failure was due not only to the theocratic basis from which he started (cc. 1-3), but also, and indeed primarily, to his dualistic conception of the nature of 'majesty'. He maintained the distinction between 'real' and 'personal' majesty; and all that he contended was that the one might [on occasion] exclude the other. E.g. 'real majesty' exists to the exclusion of 'personal majesty' (a) in a Republic, (b) in a monarchy during an interregnum, (c) when it appears as a source of fundamental laws, and (d) where the monarch is Rex sub conditione. Conversely, the 'personal majesty' of a true king includes 'real majesty', which thus disappears as a separate entity (cc. 10-11).

Salmasius, in the Defensio Regia of 1651, is already obviously under the influence of Hobbes. Like Hobbes, he regards the universus populus or universitas, in a true monarchy, as a mere aggregate. He holds the original rights of the people to be entirely merged in the sovereignty of the king, arguing that these rights only belonged to omnes collective sumptu, i.e. to the people as a concio, and that the king has taken the place of such concio (unus in istar concions). He depicts the king as the one representative of the unity of the people (unus in istar totius populi), and he holds that there is no community of the people confronting him which is capable of exercising any rights (cf. esp. c. 7). Salmasius, however, does not attempt to deduce any conception of the personality of the State from these ideas.

§ 15. THE NATURAL-LAW THEORY OF ASSOCIATIONS [DIE ENGEREN VERBÄNDE]

1 Bodin, who includes in his initial definition of the State the fact that it is composed of families (1, c. 1, no. 1), vigorously defends against Aristotle* the propriety of making the theory of the Family a part of Political Science, on the ground that the family is both a fundamental element in and an 'image' of the State (1, c. 2), and he proceeds at once (1, cc. 3-5) to treat in detail of the three powers which exist in the family [the power of the husband, that of the father, and that of the master]. Arnaeaeus takes a similar line, Polit cc. 2-5 and De rep. 1, cc. 1-4. see also Danaeus, 1, c. 3, Cruger, disp. II, Heider, pp. 328sqq., Velstenuus, dec. II-III, Bornitius, Part pp. 38sqq., Liebenthal, disp. II-IV, Olizarovius, lib. I.

The position of the Family in political theory

On Besold's treatment of the three family societies and the general family-community which they compose, see vol. IV of the Genossenschaftsrecht [not here translated], p. 13. Gregorius does homage to a similar point of view (1, c. 2), but he does not discuss the Family in any detail. Cooring also holds that it is only societates domesticae and the State which have their origin in Natural Law: cf. Diss. de republica, Op. III, pp. 763sqq., and De necessariis curitatis partibus, ibid. pp. 748sqq.

2 This is the line taken by Bodin, 1, c. 6, Arnaeaeus, Polit c. 6, De rep. 1, c. 5, Cruger, disp. III; Heider, pp. 25sqq., Velstenuus, dec. IV-V, Bornitius, Part. p. 40, Liebenthal, disp. V, Olizarovius, lib. II-III.

3 Bodin first treats of corporations in his third book, under the head of

* Aristotle, in the beginning of the Politica, where he is controverting the Politica of Plato, distinguishes the theory of the Family from that of the State. Later, however, in the course of Book I and the beginning of Book II, he deals largely with the theory of the Family as a part of the theory of the State.

*The treatment of groups
as institutions of administrative law*

administrative law. Here he describes, as Res publicae partes ac veluti membra singula, quae principi Res publicae quam capiti illigantur, first the Senate (c. 1), then the officials (c. 2) and the administrative boards (cc. 3-6), after that the corporations (c. 7), and finally the Estates (c. 8).

Gregorius similarly brings under the head of administrative law his account of the advantages and dangers of corporations (De rep. xiii, cc. 2-4). He regards corporations as being mere institutions of positive law after the State has once been formed—although, in the same context, he refers to the natural development of an ascending series of groups [while the State is being formed] (ibid. c. 2, §2).

Arnisaeus, in his comprehensive treatise on politics, only devotes a few scattered remarks to local communities and corporations at the end of his theory of the subditus maiestatis (c. 12, p. 133). Bornitus simply treats associations as subdivisions of Estates (Part. p. 72), and many other political theorists similarly consider local communities and corporations merely as political divisions of subjects—cf. Heider, pp. 268-71, Hoenius, disp. 2, §§52-7, Velsenius, iv, qu. 8-9; Busius, i, c. 13 (in a context in which the family has also been previously treated in cc. 10-11, and the institution of chivalry in c. 12); Kirchner, disp. xiv, Liebenthal, disp. v, §§1-78. We often find associations completely omitted by political theorists (e.g. Cruger), and still more often by the theorists of natural law (e.g. in the treatises cited above, §14 n. 2).

4. This is particularly the case with the ecclesiastical theorists of Natural Law, and more especially with Molina and Suarez.

5. Bodin, distinguishing collegia rerum diuinarum ac publicas pietatis causa from collegia rerum humanarum, divides the latter into those which have 'jurisdiction', and those which have not. In the former category of these secular 'colleges' he includes only 'magistrates and judges', in the latter, 'colleges' for the educatio juvenitum, and medicorum, scholariorum hominum, mercatorum, opificum, agricolarum sodalitas [such colleges thus being either educational, or professional, or occupational]—see loc. cit. no. 330.

Later, in dealing with the 'powers of colleges', he gives pre-eminence to the 'colleges of magistrates and judges', as being praecipua, because they non solum collegas singulos ac collegi totius minorem partem, sed caetera quoque religiosorum et opificum collegia, pro jure sua potestatus moderantur et coercent. These corporate bodies of judges and magistrates are distinguished from other 'colleges', which are only concerned with their own particular negotia communia, by the fact (a) of their handling tum sua tum aliena negotia, and (b) of being constituted potius aliorum quam sua causa. But they too 'must rightly and duly administer law for their own members, individually as well as collectively', before they assign rights to others. Bodin adds one qualification. The right of a college to exercise jurisdiction itself over its members is a right which is only to be recommended in the case of the 'most prudent' colleges: for other colleges, the jurisdiction of superior colleges and of the Prince is preferable (nos. 332-3).

6. Bodin argues that these other colleges [i.e. colleges other than those of magistrates and judges] jurisdictiones et imperio vacant, and have only a 'right of coercion and moderate castigation' within the limits of their statutes: even Frederick II assigned no more power to Rectors of Academies and headmasters of schools. Where collegia religiosas causa constituta are in question, the judex ordinarius has to decide how far a penalty or sentence of expulsion

*Bodin's
classification of collegia*

*Bodin on the rights of private
'colleges'*

imposed by a college is admissible. Any rule to the effect that disputes between members must only be brought before the college has no validity in crimine et iudicio publico, and in privatis iudicis the decision of disputes by a college is only valid when it takes the form of an 'arbitrary award'—and even so it must be passed by a unanimous resolution. The summoning of a meeting by the senior members or officers binds nobody to appear, unless the summoner imperium habet: failing that, recourse must be had to the government in order to issue a binding summons, but only moderate penalties can be imposed on those who absent themselves, even when such a summons has been issued. Collegia and universitates may issue edicts, salvis legibus, but they must not even discuss what is forbidden to them by law, or anything that is not included in the sphere of their corporate affairs (nos 333–7).

7. Loc. cit. no 331 (victus communis is no more necessary than an aerarium commune) see also no 332 (a 'college' can only acquire a capacity of inheritance by a special privilege to that effect [cf. the modern French rule which requires administrative authorisation for the acceptance of a gift or legacy by an établissement public], the idea of a corporation does not necessarily require a capacity of inheritance, or even of acquisition)

8. Although universitas non potest peccare, immo ne consentire quidem, Bodin holds that, in consequence of the identification of the majority with the whole body, penalties may be properly imposed on the corporate body (such as withdrawal of the right of meeting, cancellation of privileges, fines, and confiscation of property), if an offence has been committed after proper discussion and decision in due corporate forms. On the other hand, he would spare innocent individuals from incurring penalties which affect their body or life—or even their property, so far as it is possible to distinguish their property from that of the corporation. For the rest, basing himself on a full review of historical facts and on political considerations, he advises the following of a just mean between severity and excessive clemency (nos 337–42)

9. Gregorius, after speaking of the origin and the various species of ecclesiastical and secular corporations, and after limiting drastically the scope of collegia licita (De rep. XIII, c. 2), proceeds to discuss in his next chapter (c. 3), with an unusual wealth of detail, the offences of corporations (especially those of monopoly and heresy), and the three remedias which the sovereign can apply in dealing with such offences. They are (1) reformatio institutions (by way of changes, prohibitions, visitations and penalties, §§2–15), (2) abolition (§§15–21), and (3) a rule to the effect that non permittendae sunt facile novae religiones aut collegia (c. 4). In the course of this argument there is no mention of any legal limits on the sovereign power. Cf. also XIII, c. 19 (on offences of fraternities and their suppression) and XXIII, cc. 3–4 (on 'factions and conspiracies, and their remedies'). On the juristic treatises of Gregorius, see above [vol. IV of the Genossenschaftsrecht, not here translated], p. 60 n. 2, p. 65 n. 17 and p. 91 n. 90

10. Bornitius demands that 'for the preservation of the State', persons should be divided into three Estates (Part. pp. 68sqq.), and these Estates should be subdivided in alias partes, quae collegia dicuntur, ut eo rectius et corporate facultas sua munera expedire possint (p. 72). Each of these colleges—including, in the spiritual Estate, those of priests, professors, doctors and the like; in the political, those of magistrates, judges and councillors, and in the private

Bodin on
corporate property

Bodin on the offences of corporate bodies

Gregorius Tholosanus on the same theme

Bornitius theory of
bodies

Estate, those of agriculturalists, merchants and artisans—is auctoritate Principis factum et concessum. The colleges, when formed, are then united to form a corpus, and a number of corpora are finally united to form a universitas *. For the most part they have suam politiam in jure, legibus, privilegiis, pactis, suaque administrandi forma, but the rights of collegia in statu privato [i.e. in the third or 'private' Estate] belong only to the sphere of private law as a jus curum speciale (p. 93), and such private colleges, like families, can only have a politia privata (p. 105). Cf De may cc 14-39 (where it is argued that a grant by the State is always necessary to justify collegiate self-government, jurisdictio, the choice of officers, jus comitorum, the right of taxation, and the like)

Arnisaeus
on corporate bodies

11 Arnisaeus (Polit. c. 12), at the end of his theory of the subditus majestatis, speaks of their division into certain classes, ut scilicet commode gubernari per iusta et imperia majestatis possint. In this connection he discusses collegia, corpora and universitas on the basis of Bodin's scheme; he rejects entirely any toleration of associations without 'the consent and the confirmation of the State', but he allows to colleges a power of making rules de rebus suis et in collegis, and also, by authority of a special grant to that effect, a jurisdictio in collegis. Similarly, in his de iure majestatis, he interprets all corporate authority as the result of a 'concession' made by the State, except in so far as it is merely the exercise of a power to enter into contracts or of other rights at private law of ii, c. 2, §§8-9 and iii, c. 7, §10.

Burus on corporate
bodies

12 This is the argument, essentially based on Bodin, which we find, e.g. in Velstennus, Dec. iv, qu 8-10, Heider, pp. 268-71, and Liebenthal, Diss. v, §§1-78. Burus takes a more independent line; he starts by distinguishing the State, as the all-embracing universitas, from a universitas such as a local community or a collegium (i, c. 3, §3), and he then proceeds to treat particularly of collegia et corpora, which he considers to be identical (i, c. 13). He defines a corporation as universitas plurim curum, qua in certum aliquem finem contrahunt societatem ad similitudinem ciuitatis; he refuses to tolerate any other associations than those which are authorised by the State; he recommends an extreme prudence, which will allow only useful corporations, will admit no discussion of public affairs, will only recognise 'statutes' [or by-laws] as 'private agreements', and will permit only private, but not public, associations. He also refuses to allow any liberty of meeting. Cf Hartog [as cited in §14 n. 142], pp. 15-16 and 20-1.

13 Cf supra [vol. iv of the Genossenschaftsrecht, not here translated], pp. 115qq.

14 Cf e.g. Oldendorp, Isagoge, i, p. 181, Winkler, v, c. 2 and c. 4, where a distinction is drawn between res publica majestatis and res publica municipalis. Winkler argues that 'majesty' has, 'of itself and in its own right', the whole of the authority of government, but he adds that conceditur stam magistratia provincialis aut municipalis interdum, ut pro modo jurisdictionis subi commissas legem ferat, sed haec omnia precario et indulitu majestatis, non iure proprio.

Ecclasiastical
writers
unfavourable
to Groups

15 In this sense we find Covarruvias arguing (Pract. qu 1, c. 4) that the 'supreme jurisdiction of the king' (which he calls the 'Majoria') excludes any independent right of nobles, or of Ciuitates, if the king himself takes action. It is only when the king fails to make provision, or is prevented from doing so, that a universitas can appoint a Rector for itself. Molina (v, d. 3, §§ 3-5) ascribes all jurisdictio to the tota Respublica, and therefore to the king, with the result that magnates, towns, and the like, can only have a 'derivative jurisdiction' cf. ii, d. 666, and Lessius, ii, c. 33, dub. 2, on the right of taxation.

* Does this mean that the colleges in any one Estate form a corpus, and these corpora in turn form the universitas Regis? Bodin has a somewhat similar view of the relations of collegium, corpus and universitas; but his universitas is only a local community (cf pp. 64-65 supra).

16 Suarez (i, c. 8) divides potestas praecipua, which can issue commands, into potestas dominativa (or oeconomica) and potestas jurisdictionis (or politica). The former may be found even in an 'imperfect community' [e.g. the Family], for (a) the father has [naturally] a potestas dominativa over his child, and (b) such power may also arise from contract—either under natural law, through an agreement of marriage, or under positive law, through voluntary entrance into a relation of service. The potestas jurisdictionis is confined to the 'perfect community'. Only a 'supreme head' can have the legislative authority on which a potestas jurisdictionis follows, and an inferior can only exercise such authority within the limits in which it has been 'communicated to him by the head'.

17 According to Suarez (iii, cc. 2-3, 9) legislative authority, in the sphere of leges civiles, belongs only to sovereigns. This means that it belonged originally to the People, and has subsequently come to belong either to Reges supremi (and, in addition, other 'princes without a superior', and territorial princes subject to the emperor who have been duly enfeoffed as sovereigns), or to sovereign republics. Per contra, according to Book III, c. 9, nos. 16-21, the 'statutes' [or by-laws] of 'communities' have inherently nothing of the nature of lex. The 'statutes' of civitates minores [civitas being here understood to signify an Italian city of the medieval type], in the form in which they are recognised by Bartolus,* are either mere pacta, or praecepta humana temporalia, sicut sunt praecepta patris familiæ in domo sua, and even the enactments of civitates maximæ and magnæ (species which ought not properly to be distinguished) are really either pacta, or (as Baldus holds) simply the expression and outcome of jurisdictio. The real question [when we are discussing the legislative powers of a municipality or civitas] is whether (1) the civitas is a 'free people', and, as such, retineat in se aliquam potestatem supremæ respublicæ et per illam se ipsam gubernet, or (2) illam [sc. potestatem] simpliciter transtulerit in aliquem principem, vel quolibet alio justo titulo [potestas illa] translata sit. It is only of the former of these two alternatives that the Lex 'omnes populi' speaks. The instant a city is 'subject to some supreme Prince', it can no longer make laws ex potestate propria. At the most—and then only by virtue of a reservation made by itself at the time of 'transference', or as the result of a later 'concession' made by the sovereign—it is able statuere de rebus ad suam peculiarem gubernationem et administrationem pertinentibus. In other respects [i.e. apart from these particular matters] it needs the 'confirmation of the superior'. What is true of cities is similarly true of provinces, and particularly of corpora mystica.

A similar view appears in i, c. 8, no. 5 and ii, c. 1, nos. 8-10. Cf. also vi, c. 26, nos. 4-25. magistratus civiles aut respublicæ inferiores et civitates subjectæ can never establish any rule which runs contrary to the jus commune of the State, the Superior, on his side, can abrogate even the statuta which he has confirmed, but the statuentes themselves have no such power of abrogation.

Suarez
regards all real authority as belonging to the State

Suarez on the rights of municipalities

* On Bartolus, and his doctrine of the civitas sub principiis (the Italian city-state as 'its own prince'), see C. N. S. Woolf's book on Bartolus of Sassafrato, pp. 112 sqq.

if the confirmation he gave was essentialis, or if, even though it was only accidentalis, 'the Prince by confirming [a statute] made it his own law'—which is to be presumed the case

Suarez on the validity of custom

18 Cf VII, cc 1-20 According to c. 3, nos 8-9, c. 9, nos 3-11 and c. 14, no 4, a 'private person' or an 'imperfect community' (una familia) can pass neither a lex expressa nor even a lex tacita they can only establish a praeceptum, or a statutum, per modum pacti seu mutuae conventionis—and the 'precept' or 'statute' must be clearly expressed. On the other hand, any 'perfect community' (curtis, populus, congregatio ecclesiastica, [corpus] mercatorum) may consuetudinem introducere, inasmuch as, passively regarded, it is legis capax, and, regarded actively, it can make laws ut conjuncta principi vel facultatem ab eo habens, although its inherent power extends only to the making of statuta conventionalia. None the less (according to cc. 13, 14, no 5 and c. 18), the consent of the Prince is always necessary [to the validity of customary rules], whenever 'the people itself is not the supreme Prince'. In the case of communities with a power of making rules, this consent can be given by a general authorisation in the case of other communities, the de facto toleration of a 'prescriptive custom' is adequate, but otherwise an act of personal assent is necessary—though that assent may be given tacitly, assuming always that the Prince is cognisant of the usage in question

Suarez on
taxation

19 Cf v, c. 14 only the sovereign can tributa imponere it is consequent on the nature of 'majesty' that any other person—though he may acquire a right to the exactation of traditional dues—can never acquire a right of taxation, and similarly, while the sovereign may grant to an inferior ut nomine et auctoritate sua tributum imponat in particulari casu, he cannot make a valid grant to an inferior of 'the general privilege of imposing a tax independently of his own approbation', since such a privilege would offend against the nature of the State and the suprema potestas

Suarez on religious congregations

20 Thus the answers given by Suarez (iv, c. 6) to the question, Quae communitates seu congregations ecclesiasticae habeant potestatem leges condendi, depend entirely on the fundamental principle that any autonomy belonging to ecclesiastical associations must either be the result of an 'ecclesiastical jurisdiction' granted by the Pope, or, if it takes the form of passing by-laws, then such by-laws can only be regulæ operandi positæ ex conventione illorum qui sunt de communione see especially nos 12-13, 19 and 21

The corporate body reduced to a mere partnership,
like the Family

21. Thus in Gregorius (xiii, c. 2), Velstenuis (Decis iv) and Liebenthal (Diss v), collegia, corpora and universitates are reckoned as societates in Heider (pp. 268-71) they are contrasted, as societates privatae, with the societas publica of the State. Bodin (i, c. 2) compares families and corporations, without suggesting that there is any difference between the idea of family authority and that of the authority of the corporation in his view families are already competent to make statuta (e.g. 'house-laws' [like that of the Habsburg family], or compacts of mutual inheritance), and he only refuses to allow the making of such statuta to familiae obscurae (no. 19). It has already been mentioned (supra, n. 10) that Bornutius assigns the rights of corporations proper [collegia in statu privato] to the sphere of private law. Arniacius (Polit. iii, c. 12) also reduces the internal rights of associations to the level of the rights of 'societies' [or partnerships] supra, n. 11, ad finem

22 Busius (i, c. 13) their rights continetur prope iure societatis, but with some modifications, e.g. they are not dissolved by the death of their members, and they can act on the majority-principle, see n. 12 supra.

28. The traditional [Roman-law] theory of corporations is reproduced almost in its entirety in Gregorius (cf also xiii, c. 2, § 7 on hospitalia and pra loca regarded as collegia), in Besold [sec vol. iv of the Genossenschaftsrecht, not here translated, pp. 11-16], and in other writers. Some of the essential parts of that theory are also reproduced in Bodin, in Molina (cf e.g. II, d. 3 on the property of corporations, d. 300 on loans to an ecclesia or civitas, and d. 536 on hypotheca tacita of the property of the administrators of a corporation), in Suarez, and elsewhere.

Continued use of the Roman law of corporations

24. This is the view adopted by Bodin (III, c. 7, nos. 334-6), when he draws a line of division between (1) affairs in which omnes singulis must agree, because there is a question of a right belonging to all the members seorsum a communione, and (2) affairs in which the majority decides, because jus universorum is concerned. Cf Oldendorp, op. cit. I, p. 163, and Liebenthal, Disp. v, §§ 63-77. It is on the basis of this view that Bodin argues (loc. cit. no. 331) that it is compatible with the idea of a 'college' that there should be a princeps collegii who has imperium in collegis [i.e. over each distributively], but not that there should be a princeps with imperium in universo [i.e. over all collectively], as there is in a consistorium, a gymnasium, or a familia. Arnisacu takes a similar line, op. cit. p. 193.

Bodin's distinction between 'distributive' and 'collective'

25. Thus Bodin (loc. cit. no. 332), in spite of his description of jus collegii as jus universorum, argues in favour of the continuance of this jus collegii until it is legally abolished, even when all the members [collegae universi] have disappeared—declaring that it is folly to identify the collegium with the collegas. [He thus assumes that a college is a fictitious individual, distinct from its individual members.] He also regards the capacity of owning property, and particularly that of inheriting it, as a special privilege granted to the collegium [as a fictitious individual].

But he also assumes a ficta persona

26. Bodin (loc. cit. nos. 334-6) deals in detail with the validity of the majority-principle, recognising that principle in so far as there is nothing to oppose it either in jura singulorum or in leges ejus qui collegii creator est quasque principes imperio suo valere jussit. But majority-decisions, he argues, require a regular meeting, and the presence of two-thirds of the members, and then plus possunt duae partes coactae quam omnes seorsum. They bind the minority, and all individuals, but they do not bind the whole body itself or the majority. The majority can always abrogate its decisions, as the sovereign can abrogate a law, or the testator a will, or contractors a contract, and this is the case even with a unanimous decision, if the question concerned is one de jure universorum, though not if it be one de jure singulorum seorsum. Bodin mentions, in this connection, that he had himself prevented a decision of two of the Ordines Francorum which would have enured to the detriment of the Third Estate.

Bodin on the majority-principle

27. Cf Busius, supra, n. 12; Arnisacu, De mag. III, c. 7, § 10 ('in conventionis?')

28. Cf Bodin, loc. cit. nos. 337-42 (supra, n. 8), and Oldendorp, loc. cit. p. 39.

29. Thus Molina (II, disp. 3, §§ 7, 11, 12) draws a distinction between (1) dominium universitatis, which belongs to it jure universitatis and includes pastures and forests which are used by all and (2) dominium particularis... quod... universitas seu communitas aliqua non secus habet ac si esset persona privata. He holds that the taking of wood in the common forest (disp. 58), and the use of the common pasture (disp. 59), are dependent on the regulations made by the local community as owner, but he argues that offences by members of a local community against such regulations—unlike encroachments on the pastures or forests of other communities—should be punished only by fines, and not by the exaction of compensation (unless it be a question of really considerable damage), because the common property still remains intact [after the offence has been committed]. He refuses to admit that the lord of the manor court has any property in the common, and allows him only a joint right of user suo ordine et gradu (d 3, §11, d 59, §§3-5)

The Catholic writers on village commons

Similarly Lessius (ii, c 5, dub 13-14) denies any obligation to pay compensation (unless 'great damage be held to have been done to the community') in cases where a community has prohibited the use of its pastures and public woods and a person has offended against such a prohibition in loco publico communis eius ipse est pars

Lugo (i, pp 142sqq, disp 6, sect 9) takes the same view [that no compensation is due], unless there is a question of considerable damage, or of use for profit by means of sale to others, or unless the common has been let to a third party. He argues that any offence [by a member of the community against its regulations], unlike encroachments on entirely strange woods and pastures, which belong to another community or to a private person, is only an offence against obedientia, and not an offence against justitia. The relation between universitas and singulis is different, however, in a monastery [from what it is in the case of a secular body]. [In the latter case], oppidani singuli retinunt suum jus partiale ad illa bona, and they have a right of controlling their shares, because full and free property remains with the community and its members, even if the administration thereof has been transferred to some manager on its behalf. [In a monastery], although the monks in communione habeant eorum bonorum dominum, ita tamen tota administratio est penes communiam vel praelatos, ut singuli neque ex parte possint condonare aliquid

Suarez on the various forms of community

80 Suarez distinguishes between (1) the 'natural community of mankind' and (2) the communitas politica vel mystica, which is 'only one in virtue of a specific act of union in a moral association'. The latter kind of community is either of divine foundation (the Church) or of human invention. The community which is of human invention is again either (1) 'a perfect community, which is capable of political government', or (2) 'an imperfect community', which does not form a corpus and is destitute of vis coactiva. 'Perfect communities' include not only the State but also local communities, and not only 'real' but also 'personal' groups (such as orders and fraternities)—provided that such local communities and 'personal' groups have perfectum regimen et moralem unionem, and so, while 'imperfect as parts in regard to the whole', are 'perfect as regarded in themselves'. Even so, they are 'not absolutely, but comparatively or relatively, perfect'. On the other hand the 'private household' under the paterfamilias is absolutely imperfect cf. i, c 6, nos 18-20, and also supra, nn 16 and 18

81 According to i, c 6, only a 'perfect community' is passive legis capax (nos 1-16 and 21-22). But law need not always be imposed on the community qua community (ut communitas est et corpus mysticum). On the contrary, it generally affects the community not as being a community, but as being so many individuals (non collective, sed distributiva, no 17), and it may also refer to a part of the community only (nos 23-4). Yet a law which only affects the community qua community—e.g. a law which commands or forbids some act which can only be done by the corpus mysticum itself—is still a true law, for though such a law applies to una individua communitas and this community is called una persona ficta [i.e. though the law seems to be made for one 'person', which is contrary to the nature of law], yet the 'community' is a 'community' [i.e. a sum of persons], it possesses the necessary permanence, and it is directly intended to secure the common welfare of all its members. Moreover, the singuli de illa communitate are also indirectly obliged by such a law. See, in addition, 1, c. 7, and (on the other hand) the passages on the contractual character of 'statutes' cited in nn. 17, 18 and 20 above.

32 Of the Vind e Tyr, where it is argued that any part of the kingdom, and therefore any province or city—but not any individual, because the individual is not a 'part'—has the right and duty of resistance when the pact with God is broken (qu. II, pp. 94sqq.). These parts too have severally promised for themselves [just as the whole kingdom has promised for itself] that they will be true and obedient to God in accordance with the stipulation He has made (pp. 99–100)—as is also the case, the author adds, with the Estates of the Empire in Germany, or with 'parts' of the Church, such as the ecclesia Gallicana [as a part of the Church Universal]. Therefore, universi in regionibus et urbibus may rise in revolt, auctoribus magistratibus tanquam a Deo primum, dein a Principe constitutis (p. 114), and cities and provinces which do not seek to avert an attack on God's church by force of arms are guilty of a grave sin (p. 228). [As universi in a province or city may resist, so, too, may the governors] qui alicius partis regionis tutelam suscepereunt, tyrannidem tyrannumque ab ea regione urbem arcere jure suo possunt (qu. III, pp. 304 sqq. and 326 sqq.), and thus individual nobles [as having the tutela of a 'part'] may begin a revolt, though private persons can never assert the jus gladii against a tyrant. The treatise De jure mag. (qu. 6, pp. 26 sqq. and 74, qu. 7, p. 92) arrives at similar results. Danaeus (III, c. 6, p. 223) requires the consent of every province to any change of the constitution, and he adds that, when a province is not asked for its consent, 'some hold that it can choose for itself its own form of polity'—but this, he adds, is dangerous.

33 Cf. for what follows, the first eight chapters of Althusius' Politica, and also c. 9, §§ 1–7, c. 18, §§ 90–1, c. 38, §§ 76 and 110–14, c. 39, § 84; see also the connected account of the argument of these passages in the author's work on Althusius, pp. 215sqq. Reference may also be made to his Dieaeologia, I, cc. 7–8, 25–33, 78–81.

34 Cf. vol. III of the author's Genossenschaftsrecht, pp. 544–5.

35 Althusius mentions (Polit. c. 4, § 25)—but without ascribing any great significance to it—the special category of the corpus (which is a broader association of a number of collegia), as assumed in Bodin and other writers. Like Bodin and others, he counts as 'colleges' not only (1) guilds and trade-corporations and (2) corporate Estates and ecclesiastical societies, but also (3) collegiate courts of justice, administrative Boards and ecclesiastical Boards (c. 4, § 30), and (4) assemblies of representatives (c. 5, §§ 54 and 60sqq.), provincial diets (c. 8, §§ 49 and 56sqq.), and general diets (c. 18, § 62 and c. 33).

36 In the first edition of the Politica, the category of 'political association' is lacking. In that edition Althusius begins his classification of associations by distinguishing the consociatio particularis from the consociatio universalis (i.e. the State); he then subdivides the consociatio particularis into the consociatio naturalis necessaria (i.e. the Family) and the consociatio civilis spontanea, and

The Vindiciae on the rights of provinces and cities

Althusius'
classification
of collegia or 'Fellowships'

finally he subdivides the 'voluntary civil association' into the consociatio privata in collegio and the consociatio publica in universitate

87. On the political theory of Althusius see, in the previous section, nn. 36, 52, 57, 65, 67, 70-3, 75, 77, 82-5, 87, 96, 106, 108-9

88. See supra [vol. IV of the Genossenschaftsrecht, not here translated], pp. 178 sqq.

*The idea of
of the Respublica
Composita*

89. This is the line followed by Casmannus (c. 66), who contrasts this composita respublica with civitates confederatae. It is most marked in Hoenanus, who places the kingdom composed of a number of cities—under the name of respublica composita (d. 12)—half-way between the city-state, which he terms a respublica simplex (d. 11), and the 'confederation' proper. He vests the several parts of this 'composite State' with a large measure of autonomy, including even the right of secession (d. 9, §§ 44-54), but he regards collegia and sodalitates as merely useful divisions of the subjects of the State (d. 2, §§ 52-7).

German legal writers who largely follow the federal scheme of Althusius

90. See, for example, Matthias (Coll. polit. d. IV-v and Syst. polit. pp. 20-194). Societas, which is the primary conception, is either 'natural' or 'civil and voluntary'. 'natural society' includes the three 'domestic societies' [husband and wife, father and child, master and servant]. 'civil and voluntary society' shows itself first in its 'particular' form—in the vicus, pagus, oppidum, collegium, corpus, universitas and civitas—and then in its 'universal' form, the respublica.

Gneuinus treats successively of the Family (ex. II-VII), the provincial community (ex. VIII), collegia (ex. IX), and the civitas (ex. X). He declares 'Fellowships' to be useful (ex. IX, qu. 2), but regards them as permissible only ex auctoritate superioris (ibid. qu. 5).

Koenig begins his theory of the State by enumerating Families, collegia, corpora and universitates among the constituent elements of the Respublica, and then sketches the process of development towards increasingly broader and higher forms of society (Actes disp. 1, §§ 123-9, Theatrum polit. 1, c. 1, §§ 376-91).

Werdnghagen starts his classification of societas humana (II, c. 13) from the distinction between 'particular' and 'universal' society. 'Particular' society he divides into the 'simple' society of the family-community (c. 14-17), and 'composite society', which may be either an extended family-group (c. 18) or a 'Fellowship' (c. 19). Under the head of 'universal society', which is also termed universitas, he counts the vicus, pagus and civitas, but he thinks it a misuse of language that institutions of higher education should be designated by this term (c. 20). He expressly insists that the 'principal cause' of every collegium is the agreement of its members, the 'grant of a superior' being the 'less principal' (though still an indispensable) cause (c. 19, § 5).

Berckringer (I, c. 17), in dealing with 'the conjunction of persons and things in the family, college, corpus and universitas', begins with the Family (§ 2), he then deals successively with the 'college', which is produced by the consensus coequum et magistratus (§§ 3-8), the corpus (§ 9), and the universitas (§§ 10-11)—including both the universitas personarum (§§ 12-17) and the universitas rerum (i.e. the territory, §§ 18-21)), finally, he treats of the union of both of these species of universitas in the Respublica, which, he holds, may be either 'simple' or 'compound' (§§ 22-8).

Kirchner, in treating of sodalitas, collegia and corpora (disp. XIV), regards all corporate bodies as having autonomy and judicial authority over their own members, with a certain power of coercion and punishment. In § 1, line 4, he speaks of a 'concession by the supreme power' as necessary, but in line 6 he states that corporations are advantageous to the State, and only a tyrant will ever suppress them entirely—through secret and nocturnal meetings are never to be tolerated (§ 3).

41 Cf. especially Keckermann (i, c. 15, pp. 255-75), de speciali cura subditorum collectum consideratorium. He distinguishes subditorum communio ex natura (i.e. the Family) from subditorum communio magis ex instituto civili, though he admits that community of the latter sort is also based partly on natural law. Community by civil institution may be either (1) 'more particular', e.g. collegium, coetus, conventus, synagogue and sodalitas, or (2) 'more universal', as in any sort of collectio plurim diversi status hominum in unum corpus et locum in quo simul habitant. The latter species—the territorial corporation or universitas—may be either 'major' or 'minor'. The 'minor' sort is the local community, which appears as a universitas rustica in vicis vel pagis, and as a universitas oppida vel urbana in the various sorts of towns. The 'major' sort of territorial corporation is an area composed of a number of rural and urban communities, and such an area may be either angustior (e.g. the 'district, prest, civis, barony, county') or lato (e.g. the 'province, duchy, kingdom')

In spite of the structure which he thus builds, Keckermann rejects the principle of liberty of associations, as being incompatible with the monarchical principle. Where 'colleges have liberty of meeting', as the nobles have in Poland, it is a sure sign of the presence of aristocracy or democracy. The monarch cannot allow any association which has not received his consent, and he must punish secret unions severely, nor will he ever permit his subjects to erect a corporation ei ipse non praesit sua auctoritate per personam aliquam a se delegatam. He will also reserve the appointment, or at any rate the confirmation, of the officers of 'colleges', since the 'constitution and authority of the whole college' resides in these officers, and therefore the person appointing or confirming them 'has also control over the constitution and authority of the whole college'. Even in republics, he argues, this [right of appointing or confirming the officers of 'colleges'] is advisable (pp. 261-2). He treats the local community in the same way as the 'college', vesting the sovereign with the ordering of its constitution, the appointment of its officers, and a perpetual tutelary supervision (pp. 265 sqq.).

Schonborner adopts a similar view. He treats of the Family (i, c. 10), collegia et corpora (c. 11), universitates (c. 12) and the civitas (c. 13), but like Keckermann he allows the erection of corporations only 'by the authority of the sovereign', and he gives the same advice to the sovereign, word for word, in regard to [the appointment or confirmation of] officers. The same line is taken in the treatise De statu politico seu civili libri sex, i, disc. 35-42.

42 Keckermann (loc. cit.) adopts as his basis the conception of communio. Matthias (loc. cit.) uses the idea of the communicatio produced by societas. Schonborner adopts Althusius' theory of consociatio and the communicatio rerum, operarum, juris et benevolentiae which it produces (i, c. 11), but he regards this consociatio and communicatio as creating a corpus mysticum which is like the natural body—instar unus hominis est, ejusque personam repreäsentat—and he avails himself of this point of view to reproduce in extenso the whole of the Roman-law theory of corporations (i, c. 13).

Berckinger takes the same line as Schonborner. He uses the idea of a

Keckermann
on associations

Prevalence of idea of Partnership

'union of minds, services, persons, things and laws' (i, c. 17, §7), the fiction of the single personality, combined with the idea of the material identity of the universitas with its individual members (§10), the traditional theory of the negotia iuridica and the delicts of corporations (§§12-17), and the customary distinction of the various species of public and common property (c. 16, §§15-33)

Grotius on associations

48 Afterwards, in his theory of contracts (ii, c. 12), he treats of societas negotiatoria (§24) and societas navalis (§25), and devotes a whole chapter to foederata (c. 15)

44. Cf. i, c. 1, §3 a 'society without inequality' exists as between fratres, cives, amici, foederati an 'unequal society' as between pater et liber, dominus et serva, rex et subdit, Deus et homines. In the same way there are also two sorts of justum—aequatorum and rectorum

45. n, c. 6, §§4-8, iii, c. 20, §5 of the passages in nn. 97 and 132 to §14

46. Cf. supra, nn. 57 and 66 to §14

47. Cf. supra, n. 51 to §14 and pp. 51-2sqq., with nn. 97, 98, 99

48. Cf. the decisive statement in n, c. 5, §17, quoted in n. 74 to §14. Grotius proceeds to discuss in detail a number of questions—the possibility of an equality of votes, in which case no decision can be attained [in matters of policy], but in criminal proceedings acquittal must follow (§19), the methods prescribed by Natural Law for arriving at a decision when there are more than two sententes (§19), the rule of Natural Law by which jus absentium accrescit interim praesentibus, while positive law often requires the presence of two-thirds (§20), the 'natural order' among the socii, according to the ages of the members (§21), and the counting of a majority by the shares [belonging to the members] where a res (e.g. an inheritance or an estate) is the basis of the societas (§22)

49. n, c. 2, §1. It is true that the members are responsible for the sum involved in proportion to their shares, but they are responsible non qua singuli, sed qua pars universorum. As against this rule of Natural Law, the jus gentium voluntarum may introduce, and appears to have actually introduced, the rule that pro eo, quod debet praestare civilis aliqua societas aut ejus caput, 'there is a lien and obligation' (sometimes primary and sometimes secondary) 'on all the goods, corporeal and incorporeal, of the persons who are included in such a society or are subject to its head' (ibid. §2). There is a need for such a rule, since it is difficult to get at the imperantes, nor does it contradict Natural Law to such an extent as to be inadmissible

50. Cf. n, c. 21, §§2-7. A community is responsible, properly speaking, only for its own delicts, and thus it cannot be responsible for a factum singulorum, except as the result of its own patentia or receptus (i.e. harbouring the person or persons concerned). Conversely, singuli are responsible for the offences of the universitas, and subdit for the delicts of the summa potestas, only in cases where they have incurred a joint responsibility by giving assent thereto or by executing an unlawful command. The results [of a corporate delict] descend, it is true, from universi to singuli, because ubi universi, ibi et singuli universi non possunt nisi ex singulis quibusque constare, nam singuli quinque congregati, vel in summam reputati, faciunt universos. But the innocent minority must be treated gently in the matter of punishment, because, in spite of what has just been said, distinctae sunt poenae singulorum et universitatis. There is a distinction, for instance, between the death-penalty, as applied to individuals, and mors curta, cum corpus civile dissolvitur—similarly the enslavement

Grotius on the majority-principle

Grotius on corporate liability for debt

Grotius on the delicts of corporate bodies

ment of individuals differs from the servitus civilis of the universitas or its transformation into a mere province. Similarly, again, the confiscation of corporate property is something different from the confiscation of private property. It is thus unjust that innocent individuals should lose their property through the delict of a universitas (cf. also §§ 11, 17, 18). On the other hand, a 'consequential loss' may affect innocent individuals, just as children suffer from a confiscation of property pronounced against their parent, so individuals suffer from the punishments inflicted on corporations—sed ea in re, quae ad ipsas non pertinet nisi per universitatem.

51. See the preceding note, and also nn 67, 70, 89, 90, 121 and 127 to § 14.

52. In treating of the question raised in n. c 21, § 8—whether 'a penalty can be exacted in every case for the delict of a universitas'—Grotius argues that an affirmative answer appears to be inevitable, because quamdui universitas durat, idem corpus est. The true answer, however, is in the negative. A distinction has to be drawn between attributes which are predicated de universitate primo ac per se, e.g. the possession of an aerarium or of leges, and those which only belong to it de derivatione a singulis, e.g. the attributes of learning, courage, or merit, for such attributes primarily appertain to individuals, ut animus habentibus, quem universitas per se non habet. In the latter case, therefore, the merit disappears extinctus illis per quos ad universitatem meritum deincepsatur, and what is true of merit is also true of [the opposite of merit, i.e.] a delict which involves a penalty. The position is different, however, in regard to divine punishment, which often comes upon a later generation only.

53. Hobbes' theory of associations, which is only indicated in the treatise De cive, is developed in the Leviathan, where the whole of c. 22 is devoted to it.

54. Cf. Leviathan, c. 22 and De cive, cc. 12–13. Hobbes compares corpora legitima to the muscles of the human body, and illegitima to its worms. [Hobbes' remarks that in any event 'the great number of corporations' is 'like worms in the entrails of a natural man'].

55. Hobbes, in c. 22 of the Leviathan, also applies this idea to parliaments, which he regards as 'regular subordinate systems', with a personality of their own, which have been instituted for a limited time. They can only discuss proposals put before them by the Ruler, and they have no authority other than given by the terms of their summons, otherwise there would be two powers in the State.

56. This is the argument of the Leviathan, c. 22, but it already appears in the De cive, c. 5, § 10. In such a case [i.e. the case of a claim by a subordinate system against its members] the members may also occasionally protest with success against majority-decisions, but this is inadmissible in a sovereign assembly, where such a protest would bring in question the suprema potestas itself, and where, apart from that, quicquid sit a summa potestate auctoribus fit curibus singulis et omnibus.

57. In provinces and colonies he thinks a monarchical constitution preferable, as even democracies generally recognise. Trading companies, on the other hand, are best managed by a coetus, with a right of voting for all who contribute money. Leviathan, c. 22.

58. He states a different point of view in the De cive, c. 7, § 14. Dealing with the question whether the 'person' of the State can itself commit sin, he concludes that in a monarchy the Ruler himself commits a sin if he offends against Natural Law, qua in ipso voluntas civilis eadem est cum naturali, whereas

Grotius tends to resolve corporations into individuals

Hobbes on corporations

Hobbes on Parliament

Hobbes on colonies and companies

Hobbes on sins and delicts of groups in a democracy or aristocracy the sin is not that of the persona civilis, but of cuus illi quorum suffragus decretum est—peccatum enim sequunt voluntatem naturalem et expressam, non politicam, quae est artificiosa

No question of a delictum [i.e. a legal offence, as distinct from sin or peccatum] can ever arise in this connection [i.e. in regard to the State], as it does in regard to Systemata subordinata. The point is simply that peccatum, i.e. sin as distinct from delict, cannot be attributed to a persona civilis [as such, and apart from the 'natural will' of its bearer]

Hobbes on the debts of groups

59. Hobbes would regulate responsibility for debts in Systemata mercatorum in a somewhat different way. In such 'systems' there should be an obligation 'of each member severally to pay the whole of the debt' to a third party, because that party knows nothing of an 'artificial person', sed personas naturales eorum omnes obligari sibi supponit. On the other hand a creditor who is also a 'member of the System'—being, in that capacity, a debtor himself [and so unable to take action against individuals which would also be action against himself]—can only take action against the system and its common funds. [In this latter case, therefore, the general rule enunciated in the text, that the system alone is liable, applies also to systemata mercatorum.] If the State, by virtue of its supreme power, demands money from such a system, the members must furnish the sum demanded by making proportionate contributions [i.e. contributions proportionate to their shares]

The Empire a mere name

60. Cf e.g. Biermann's Diss. de jure principatus, I, p. 6, §10, Michael, I, p. 188, §§9sqq., Cluten, II, p. 10, §3 and pp. 35sqq., §§9–15, Engelbrecht, II, p. 187, §§97sqq., Sindt Schütz, I, ex 1, th. 16–19. A different view appears in Wurmser, Exerc. III, qu. 2 and 22 (the Empire is now only a name) cf. also Limnaeus, VII, c. 1, no. 32 (Roman Empire and German monarchy have gradually merged to such an extent quod nemo, nisi ille qui divum choros regit, dissolvi potens est)

Suarez (III, c. 7, nos. 1–13 and c. 8) expressly denies the emperor's imperium mundi even the Pope, according to III, c. 6, has no such imperium, because, apart from the States of the Church, he has no 'direct temporal power'. Cf also Vasquez, cc. 8, 20, 21

The idea of a societas gentium

61. Connarus (I, c. 5, nos. 1 and 4, and c. 6, nos. 2–3) holds that jus gentium is the product of a societas humana, in which the original unity of mankind has continued to be preserved even after its division into 'civil societies', and in which a relic of the old community of all men thus persists. For similar expressions of Omphalus, I, c. 38 and Winkler, I, c. 9

Gregorius Thol. (I, c. 3, §§11sqq.) regards commune jus gentium as the survival of a civitas mundana, with God for its king and all men for its citizens, which in all other respects has split into coetus et cunctas partiales

Gryphius, in §§12sqq. of his De civili societate (printed in Arumaeus, I, no. 6), speaks of a universalis societas humana, cujus vinculum est jus naturale. Cf. Johannes a Felde, I, c. 1, §5.

Suarez (III, c. 2, no. 5, c. 4, no. 7, c. 19, no. 9) argues that in secular matters aliqua unitas still survives from the [original] unity of mankind, so that men continue to constitute a societas et communicatio, and although unaquaque civitas perfecta, res publica, aut regnum, sit in se communitas perfecta et suis membris constans, nihilominus quaelibet illarum est etiam membrum aliquo modo huius universi this is the basis of international law

Grotius speaks of [States as] membra unius corporis (II, c. 8, §26, c. 15, §§5 and 12), of a societas humana (ibid. c. 20, cf. c. 21, §3), and of jus gentium

as securing property even to children and lunatics, personam illorum interim quasi sustinente genere humano (ibid c. 3, §6)

62. Albericus Gentilis (in his De jure bellorum of 1588, pp. 11-13) refers the obligation of jus gentium to the fact that, although all peoples have never assembled [to enact it], quod successive omnibus placere visum est, id totius orbis decreatum fuisse existimatur. He adds immo, ut rectio civitatis et legislatio est penes civitatis majorum partem, ita orbis rectio est penes congregationem majoris partis orbis.

In the same way Victoria speaks of a human commonwealth, including all States as its members, in which majority-decisions are valid (Rel. iii, nos. 12 and 15).

The Vind. c. Tyr. makes the unity of humana societas the source of a right and duty of neighbouring States to intervene for the protection of oppressed subjects against a tyrant (qu. iv, pp. 348-58)—just as (ibid. pp. 329-48) it makes the conception of a single Church the justification of intervention against religious oppression.

Boxhorn (i, c. 2, §§3-8) regards jus gentium as the outcome of the universalia Res publica omnium hominum.

68. The idea [of a natural community connecting States] is absent in Bodin and his school. In the view of Hobbes, as we should expect, the natural condition of States, like the primitive state of nature among individuals, is a condition of bellum omnium contra omnes, and a real international law is therefore absolutely impossible.

64. Suarez (loc. cit.) lays emphasis on the idea that it is only particular nations which are States with legislative power. There cannot, therefore, be any leges civiles universales, common adhesion to international law constitutes only a societas quasi politica et moralis, and it is only 'in a sense' (aliquo modo) that States are members of a larger whole. Connarus also (loc. cit.) terms the universal society only quasi omnium urbis et civitas, and international law only quasi jus civile.

65. Cf. Bodin (n, c. 6, no. 224 and c. 7), Althusius (Polit. c. 17, §§25-53), Casmannus (c. 66), Hoerorumus (dd. 12 and 13), Grotius (Apologeticus, Paris, 1622, c. 1). See also Brie, Der Bundesstaat, i, pp. 14sqq. and G. J. Ebers' recent work on Die Lehre vom Staatenbunde, Breslau, 1910, pp. 10sqq.

66. See above [vol. iv of the Genossenschaftsrecht, not here translated], p. 274 no. 74. See also Werdenhagen (iii, c. 25, §16), on a federation as a corpus foederatum, but not a res publica, Althusius (c. 33, §§122-36), on comitatus sociorum confoederatorum, and Arnsacius (De rep. n, c. 4, s. 2, §§225qq), on confoederationes arcithores which have the appearance of a Res publica.

67. In i, c. 3, §7 Grotius deals both with 'unions' (which he knows only in the form of personal unions), and with 'confederations' (Staatenbunde). In ii, cc. 15-16, on the other hand, he deals only with foedera or treaties, which he divides into 'equal' and 'unequal', and he remarks in an earlier passage (i, c. 3, §21) that even an 'unequal treaty' does not extinguish sovereignty. Grotius was the first thinker to draw the contrast between unions and federations of Juraschek, Personal and Real Union, p. 2, and Ebers, op. cit. pp. 17sqq.

68. See Victoria, Rel. i, qu. 5, no. 8 and iii, Vasquez, Controv. 8, 20, 21, Catholic 27, Soto, iv, qu. 4, a. 1-2, x, qu. 3, a. 1, Molina, ii, d. 21, Lessius, ii, c. 5 and iii-iv, Suarez, i, c. 7, no. 5, c. 8, no. 9, iii, c. 3, no. 8, cc. 6-8, Contzen, the Church ii, c. 16 and vi, Claudio de Carnin, i, cc. 13 and 15, Menochius, Hiero- as superior politica, I, c. 1 and II, cc. 1sqq. Among the Monarchomachi, see Boucher, I, cc. 5-8 and 18, and II, Rossaeus, cc. 3-11, Mariana, I, cc. 8 and 10.

See also Pighius (†1542), Hierarchiae ecclesiasticae assertio, Cologne, 1551 (first printed 1538), Sanderus, De visib; monarchia Ecclesiae, libri: VIII, Louvain, 1571, Schulting, Hierarchiae anacrisis, Cologne, 1604.

Theory of its potestas indirecta

69 See Bellarmine, De membris ecclesiae militantis, III, 6, De Summo Pontifice lib. V, and De potestate summa Pontificis in rebus temporalibus ad Barlaum, Rome, 1610, Molina, II, d. 29, Suarez, III, c. 6, Barbosa on c. 6, x, I, 33 [of the canon law], Gonzalez Teller on c. 6, x, I, 6, no. 34 and c. 6, x, I, 33, nos. 14-19. A similar view is already to be found in Soto, IV, qu. I, a. 1. Of course the theory which ascribed to the Pope a direct power over emperor and kings did not disappear: cf. e.g. Restaurus Caldis in Tract Utriusque Juris, XVI, no. 30, qu. 50, Marta, Tract de jurisdictione, Mainz, 1609 (esp. I, cc. 5, 8, 17-26 and IV); Laymann on c. 34, x, I, 6 and c. 6, x, I, 33.

70 Cf. Gregorius Thol. VII, c. 2, Tuldien, De regimine civili, I, cc. 17-18, P. de Marca, De concordia sacerdotum et imperii seu de libertatibus ecclesiae Gallicanae libri VIII, ed. J. H. Bochmer, Leipzig and Frankfort, 1708 (books I-IV first printed at Paris in 1641, and the whole work in Baluze's edition of 1603), esp. II, c. 1, where it is argued that while there are potestates distinctae, there is a societas between the two. See also supra [vol. III of the Genossenschaftsrecht], pp. 813sqq.

71 See supra, vol. III, pp. 799sqq.

The Lutheran theory

72 A complete formulation of this expression is to be found in B. Carpzov, Jurisprudentia ecclesiastica seu consistorialis. In I, tit. I, def. 2, he describes the 'double person' of the territorial prince, who exercises 'double power, ecclesiastical as well as political' in I, tit. I, def. 11-12, he treats of the consistories as his organs in I, tit. III, def. 27, he explains the ordered co-operation of the 'whole church' in the three Estates: see also Defens. 113. But a full elaboration of the theory of the episcopal system may already be found in M. Stephani, De jurisdictione, III, p. 1, cc. 1 and 15. In addition see Omphalus, I, c. 3 (there is a 'double polity', but the ecclesiastical commission of the territorial prince comes from God), E. Cothmann on Cod. I, 2, qu. IV and Cod. I, 2, Arnisaeus, De iure mag. II, c. 6, De subiectione et exemptione clericorum, etc. (published at Strasburg in 1635, but written in 1612), B. Meissner, De legibus, IV, s. 2, Wurmser, Exerc. V, qu. 1-24, Cluten, in Biermann, II, pp. 18sqq., §§5-8, Lampadius, p. 1, §§16-29, Schutz, II, exerc. 14, pp. 911-1000, Knipschildt, II, c. 3 and V, c. 8.

Zepper and others on the Calvinist polity

73. This view is worked out completely in e.g. Zepper, De politia Ecclesiastica, Herborn, 1595. He treats in Book I of the subject-matter of ecclesiastical administration, in Book II of ecclesiastical office, in Book III of church government. Church government is conducted by conventus in the four stages (cc. 1-7) of 'presbyteries', conventus classis [or 'classes'], provincial synods and general synods (subject to the general principle that quae in inferioribus conventibus aut gradibus deciderit passant, ad superiores deverb non debent), and also by visitaciones (cc. 8-11). But the secular authority has a power of co-operation, since magistratus and ministerium are two institutions of one and the same community, ordained for the Church by God (c. 12). Compare also the doctrine of the Vind. c. Tyr. (qu. II, pp. 74sqq.) on the joint contract.

* Cf. for this theory of 'alliance', the work of Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester, on The Alliance between Church and State, published in 1736. It was a work which had some vogue in England during the eighteenth century.

of people and king with God, the treatise De jure mag (qu 10), Hotoman, Francogallia (c. 22), and especially Althusius (c 8, §§6–39, c 9, §§31sqq and c. 28). Cf also David Blondel, De jure plebis in regime ecclesiastico, Paris, 1648, on the inalienable rights of the congregation, which are never transferred to the government

None of this applies, of course, to the body of opinion which is based on the teaching of Zwingli. Zwingli rejected entirely the conception of a 'spiritual State' and a 'spiritual authority', and ascribed all power of ecclesiastical government, as being 'external' in its nature, to the Christian State see his Works, 1, pp 197 and 346

74 Cf Stephen of Winchester, Oratio de vera oboedientia (1536), in Goldast [Monarchia Sancti Romani Imperii], 1, pp 716–33, where it is contended that Reges, Principes et Magistratus Christiani unusquisque suas Ecclesiae supremum in terra caput sunt, et religionem cum primis procurare debent. Cf also Johannes Beckinsav, De supremo et absoluto Regis Imperio liber unus, with a dedication to Henry VIII, in Goldast, 1, pp. 733–55, Warenum de Erenbergk, De regni subdus (cc 1–2, pp 12–43), who argues for a jus majestatis, suprematis, superioritatis absolutae potestatis etiam in ecclesiastico, Alexander Irvine (Scotus), De jure regni diaconi, Leyden, 1627, Keckermann, Polit 1, c 32, who holds that principes habet jus majestatis ecclesiasticum, ideoque potestatem ordinandi ea quae ad cultum Dei et veram religionem tuendam pertinent, p 516, Friderich, Polit c 12, Hoenanus, Polit 1, §43, v, §§3–55, Kirchner, Dusp vi, Graszwinkel, De jure mag c 5

Sec also Carolus Molinacius, Comm. ad Codicem, on Constit Frid Imp 'Cassa et irrita', pp 29–30, and Besold, Diss de jure sect 2

75. See above (vol iv of the Genossenschaftsrecht, not here translated), p 82, n 65, and cf Besold, Diss de jure sect 2, Diss de jure coll c 2, §§5–6, Diss de jure et divisione rerum, c 5

76 See, on the one side, Hobbes, De cive, c 17 and Leviathan, c 39, and on the other, Milton, Prose Works, II, pp 520sqq

Biermann (Diss de jure princ 1, no 16, §§21sqq) also combines the demand for freedom of conscience (§§26–8) with a general point of view which is 'territorial'.

77. Fourth edition, the Hague, 1661 first printed at Paris, 1648

78 In this justification of the majority-principle (c 4, §6) Grotius, it is Grotius' curiously to notice, deserts the individualistic point of view on which he De Imperio strictly insists, in this very connection, in all the rest of his writings (cf supra, n 48).

79 See c. 4, §§9–13 The regimen constitutum ex consensu, which issues in e.g. the institution of the Sabbath and the appointment of deacons, belongs to the Church by Natural Law, data enim universitate, hoc ipsum jus ex natura universitatis continuo sequatur. Positive law may deprive the Church of particular rights, but it may also confer upon it an imperium summum or inferius.

80 Positive law may confer upon pastors an imperium inferius. But in that case such imperium is not the expression of the sacra functio they exercise—a function which is subject to the State only in the ordinary way. It is the outcome, and the expression, of political authority, and therefore pastors, in so far as they exercise such an imperium, supremum potestatum vocari et delegari sunt. Cf c 2 and c 4, §§7–8, 11–12 and 14

81. Cf c 1 Grotius proceeds to deal in detail with the action of sovereignty upon the different areas of ecclesiastical life, maintaining throughout

The territorial theory

Uniformity or toleration

Grotius on the rights of the Sovereign over the Church

the principle that the indestructible rights of the sovereign continue still to exist, by virtue of Natural Law, even where certain rights are delegated, by virtue of positive law, to other ecclesiastical or secular 'Subjects'. It depends on the will of the sovereign whether he admits co-operation of the clergy (c. 6) or the participation of synods (c. 7, §§ 1-8) in the exercise of ecclesiastical authority, which includes the power of deciding on doctrine (c. 5). He can appoint the members of synods, or he can allow them to be elected with a reservation in favour of his own jus imperii in electionem, he has the power of summoning, adjourning and proroguing synods, and he possesses the right of confirming, changing or altering all the acts of synods (c. 7, §§ 9-17). Ecclesiastical legislation belongs to him, including the allowance and disallowance of confessions, and the ordering of all things which concern 'the public exercise of true religion', the Church has no right of legislation at all in virtue of the law of God, and so far as it possesses such a right in virtue of positive law, it possesses it, at the most, only cumulative et dependenter (c. 8). The sovereign alone has ecclesiastica iurisdictio, all jurisdictio of the clergy, so far as it is not really simple suasus et directus, is based on delegation by the State, and is subject to appellatio ab abusu (c. 9). The sovereign has the confirming and dismissing of the holders of the necessary ecclesiastical offices (presbyterium and diaconatus), and while the original appointment of such persons belongs naturaliter (though at the same time mutabiliter) to the Church, the sovereign not only controls all appointments, but may also make them himself (c. 10). He can also institute ecclesiastical offices which are not 'necessary' (the offices of bishop and elder, c. 11) he retains supreme authority over all boards or corporations or persons in possession of ecclesiastical powers, since any inferior potestas exercising a jus circa sacra necessarily derives such right from him, moreover, the authority exercised by such inferior powers must be circumscribed, on grounds of expediency, within the narrowest possible limits (c. 12).

The only limit to jus imperii circa sacra admitted by Grotius, other than the impossibility of controlling actus interni, is the jus dictum, but even commands of the sovereign which are contrary to the word of God oblige the members of the State—not indeed to obey, but at any rate to abstain from active opposition (c. 3).

82. Views similar to those of Grotius are to be found in Marcus Antonius de Dominis, an archbishop of Spalato who went over to the Church of England (1560-1624) see his De republica ecclesiastica libri X (of which Part I appeared in London in 1618, Part II in London in 1620, and Part III in Hanover in 1622), more especially Book V, which assigns to the Church only a potestas spiritualis, and no vera praefectura et iurisdictio, cf. also Book VI, cc. 3-7.

83. For Conring's views see the Corollaries to his treatise De constitutione episcoporum Germaniae (Exerc. VII in Exerc. de rep. Germ. Imp.), of May 26, 1647 According to the Third Corollary, Ecclesia in hisce terris vere non est aliqua res publica, sed naturam potius habet collegi in republica constituta. According to the Fourth, however, the 'authority and assent' of the Res publica are not needed omnis ex parte for an 'ecclesiastical society', as they are for the institution of other 'colleges', and according to the Fifth, the 'universal church', in virtue of natural law and the law of God, is 'one body' in exactly the same sense as the whole of mankind or universitas omnium bonorum hominum.

84. Politia ecclesiastica (Amsterdam, 1663 sqq.), vols. I-IV.

Antonius de Dominis

Conring on Church and State

85 Ibid. Part 1, Bk. 1, tract. 1, c. 1. As distinct from the 'mystic and invisible Church', the 'external Church' is a 'visible collection', whose 'immediate foundation' is consensus mutuus et arbitrium exercitū declaratum eorum quā cōcūnt in ecclesiam, though 'divine institution' is its 'ultimate foundation' (§4). The erection of the ministry also depends on consent

86. Ibid. §8. With strict logic, he rejects the theory of canon law in regard to the distinction of ecclesia simplex and ecclesia collegata: all churches are 'collegiate', and none of them has any advantage over any other (ibid 1, 1, tr 1, c. 6). He also pronounces against all separate ecclesiastical fellowships and fraternities (ii, rv, tr 4).

87 1, 1, tr 2, cc 4-6. He describes the populus seu corpus ecclesiasticum as the 'Subject' or owner of ecclesiastical authority—not the 'people alone', nor the clergy alone, but the whole organised ecclesiastical people including its pastors

88 In 1, 1, tr 1, c 1, §8 Voetius distinguishes four possibilities (1) identity of the political with the ecclesiastical corpus, as in Israel, England, Switzerland and Geneva, (2) the recognition of the true religion as the only public religion, with toleration of different creeds and confessions, as in the Netherlands, (3) heterodox political community, with toleration of the true Church, as in France, (4) a political community hostile to the true Church, as in most countries

89 1, 1, tr 2, cc 4-5

90 1, 1, tr 2, cc 2, 5, 7-15, II, III, tr 1, cc 3-5. He speaks accordingly of a separate politia ecclesiastica, distincta a politia politica et oeconomica, 1, 1, tr 2, c. 7, §5

91 1, IV, tr 2, c 1, §§1-2. Property belongs to the 'visible church', because the 'mystical church' is not capable of holding property. It does not belong to privati, nor again to collegia ciuica or the aerarium publicum. We may describe what belongs to the Church as bona Dei or patrimonium Christi, because Christ is the Head of the 'mystical body' of which all believers are members

92 Cf. Ludiomaeus Colinius, Papa Ultrajectinus, seu Mysterium iniquitatis reductum a clarissimo viro Gisberto Voetio, in opere Politiae ecclesiasticae, London, 1668. This work seeks to prove that the theory of Voetius, if it shows more piety, also betrays more absurdity, than that of the papalists. Any theory which assumes two separate powers is unchristian *

* The real author of this work was L. du Moulin (1606-80), who after studying medicine at Leyden and Cambridge was Professor of Ancient History at Oxford from 1648 to 1660, and afterwards lived at Westminster. He also wrote a work, in English, on The Rights of Churches

The collegial theory of Voetius

Four possible relations of Church and State

§16. THE GENERAL THEORY OF THE GROUP
(VERBANDSTHEORIE) IN NATURAL LAW

States as moral persons in a state of nature

1 See Spinoza, Tract pol c. 3, §§11-18; Pufendorf, Elem §§24-6, De jure nat et gent. II, c. 3, §23, Thomasius, Institut. iur. div. I, c. 2, §§101sqq., Gundling, Jus nat. and Disc. c. 1, §54, Hertius, Comm. II, 3, pp. 21sqq., Beermann, Med c. 2, J. H. Bochamer, P. gen. c. 2, §§3sqq., P. spec. I, c. 3, §22 n. 6 (who speaks of 'a state of nature or liberty', involving a specus iuris naturae, as being free and equal 'moral persons'), Wolff, Instit. §§1088sqq., Jus deinceps, Elem I, c. 1, §§21-2, II, c. 1, §§1 and 21, Daries, P. spec. §§790sqq., Nettelbladt, Syst. nat. §§1405sqq. (quaelibet gens, qua talis considerata, est persona moralis in statu naturali invens, et plures gentes sunt plures istiusmodi personae), Achenwall, II, §§210-88 (jus naturale exists among 'eternal societies', i.e. among gentes regarded as 'free moral persons'), Justi, Natur und Wesen, §§222-3, Locke, II, c. 12, §§145-6 [of the Second Treatise on Government].

2 See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 287sqq. and 300sqq.

3 On this point Spinoza (Tract. theol.-pol c. 16 and Tract. pol c. 2) agrees entirely with Hobbes.

4 This is the view not only of Hobbes (see supra, p. 85 and no. 63 to 15), but also of Spinoza (Tract. theol.-pol cc. 16, 17, 20 and Tract. pol cc. 3, 4, 5).

5 This is the reason why the German writers on natural law, though following Hobbes closely in other respects, from the time of Pufendorf onwards, always attack his conception of the state of nature. Gundling comes nearest to Hobbes' conception (Jus nat. c. 3 and Exerc. 4, pp. 155sqq.), but he arrives at totally different results.

Thomasius on the nature of Law

6 At first Thomasius regarded all law as the 'will' of a 'ruler'—treating lex positiva as the command of men, and lex naturalis as that of God, cf. Instit. iur. div. I, c. 1, §§28sqq. and Annot. ad Strauch. diss. I, pp. 2sqq. In his later days he continued to believe in the imperative character of positive law, but instead of describing lex naturalis as a divine command with 'external obligation', he now defined it as merely a consilium producens internam obligationem, or a dictamen rationis, of which God was the ultimate author but not the legislator of Fund. iur. nat. I, c. 5, §§28-81. [This later view involves him in some difficulties.] Making a general division of the normae which limit the action of human will into the ethical, the political and the legal (ibid. cc. 1-4), he proceeds to apply this triple division not only to positive rules, but also to the rules of nature (c. 5, §§58sqq.); but he fails to make any real distinction between 'Natural Law' proper and 'natural ethics' or 'natural politics', because he cannot prove that Natural Law [regarded as a 'counsel' or 'dictate of reason'] possesses that attribute of being enforceable which he regards (c. 7) as essential [to law proper]. [We may compare with his change of front in regard to Natural Law a similar change in regard to customary law.] At first he regarded customary law as only existing in consequence of the sanction of a sovereign (Inst. iur. div. I, c. 2, §109); afterwards, he allowed that it possessed the character of law even if it had no such sanction (e.g. in the case of customary law inter gentes), but he qualified this admission by adding that such customary law was a law without obligatio, cf. Fund. I, c. 5, §78, Addit. ad Huberi Praelect. Inst. 1, 2, nos. 7 and 12, and Diss. de jure consuet et obseruantia.

7. This fact of external obligation is expressly emphasised by Gundling, c. 1, §§47–50 (obligatio interna et externa), Becker, §§2, 5, Mueldener, 1, §1 (exactissime obligans), J. H. Boehmer, 1, P. gen. c. 1, Achenwall, Proleg. §§98sqq., 1, §44.

8. This is the composite view which appears in Pufendorf, cf. De off. hom. et civ. c. 2 taken along with c. 3, and J. n. et g. II, c. 3 taken along with 1, c. 6 (God may be regarded as 'Sovereign', and lex naturalis as His voluntas, but apart from lex divina positiva there is also a lex divina per ipsam rerum naturam hominibus promulgata). It was the original view of Thomasius (supra, n. 6), it appears in Alberti, c. 1, Cumberland, c. 5, Becker, §§2–6, Mueldener, Pos. 1, §1 (jus naturae est decretum voluntatis diuinae per rationem promulgatum), H. de Coccej, Prodromus, S. de Coccej, De princ. iur. nat. univ., Tract. iur. gent. Parts I and II, Novum systema, 1, §§56–60 ('a command of nature and its author, declared to mankind by reason'), Kestner, c. 1, J. H. Boehmer, P. gen. c. 1 (a 'norm' which proceeds from the 'will' of God, but 'is written in the hearts of men'), Schmier, 1, c. 1, s. 1, §3, Heineccius, 1, c. 1, c. 3, Achenwall, Proleg. and 1, §§73sqq. (a true law of God, in the juristic sense).

9. This is a view which appears in Horn, sancitas divina, and not voluntas divina, as the source of natural law, and human reason (as a relic of man's being originally in the image of God) is the means of knowing what it is (II, c. 2). The same view appears in Huber, he holds that there can be law even without a Superior or force (1, 1, c. 1, §§2–5), and he regards natural law as a command of reason implanted in man by nature, and by God as the author of nature (ibid c. 2). A similar view is also to be found in Gundling (c. 1, §§4–11), and in Leibniz, who derives natural law from the nature of God, and regards command and enforcement as unessential (Op. IV, 3, pp. 270sqq., 275sqq., 294sqq.). Cf. also Wolff, Instit. §§39, 41, 67, and Montesquieu, Esprit des Lois, I, cc. 1–2 (raison primitive... les lois de la nature dérivent uniquement de la constitution de notre être).

10. Cf. e.g. Gundling, c. 1, §§47–50, S. de Coccej, 1, §56 (idque metu poenae), Achenwall, 1, §44 (sub communitatione poenae).

11. When, as in Grotius (Proleg. no. 11 and 1, c. 1, §10) and his precursors (on whom see the author's work on Althusius, p. 74), the assumption was made that there would be a Natural Law even if God did not exist, or if He were unjust, the logical consequence of that assumption was the abandoning of any idea that it was derived from the will or the nature of God, and this is what we find in Thomasius, Fund. 1, c. 6 [cf. supra, n. 6]. After Locke in England, and Rousseau and his successors in France, had contented themselves with merely invoking 'the order of nature', the connection of Natural Law with the idea of God tended also to disappear among German thinkers, it is not present, e.g. in Justi, Schademantel, Schlozer, Hoffbauer or Fichte. Kant definitely holds that the notion that God is the author of the moral law is untenable, for God is Himself under that law, and He is obliged to act by its rules (Works, VII, pp. 8sqq.).

12. Cf. Leibniz, Novus methodus, §74, and introduction to the Cod. iur. gent. 1, §11, J. H. Boehmer, P. gen. c. 1, Schmier, Jus publ. univ. 1, c. 1, s. 2, §§1–2, Achenwall, Proleg. §§98sqq., 1, §§34sqq., Fichte, Works, III, pp. 145sqq.

*Rights under
Natural Law*

18 In regard to international law, there was unanimity on this point. So far as the public law of the State was concerned, all the theorists who recognised a right of resistance to any breach of Natural Law by the sovereign sought to justify their view by assuming a return to the state of nature, and therefore to the right of self-help belonging to that state. Cf the author's work on Althusius, pp. 314-5, and cap. Wolff, Polit. §§433sqq., Jus nat. viii, §§1041sqq., Instit. §§1079sqq., Daries, §§710sqq., Achenwall, i, §2, ii, §§200sqq., Scheidemantel, iii, pp. 364sqq., and also Rousseau, iii, c 10.

*Natural Law
as obligatory*

14 For this reason Natural Law was declared to be a 'perfect law' with 'coercive power' cf. Thomasius, Instit. iur. div. i, c. 1, §§103sqq., Gundling, i, c. 1, §54, Achenwall, Proleg. §§98sqq. and i, §§34sqq., Wolff, Instit. §§80sqq. [One exception was made], in regard to the relation of the sovereign to his subjects, the opponents of any right of resistance held that Natural Law had only a 'directive power' [over the sovereign], and therefore only imposed an 'imperfect obligation', but at the same time they did not abandon the idea that this imperfect obligation was a real legal obligation of Pufendorf, Elem. i, d. 12, §6, J. n. et g. vii, c. 5, §§8, viii, c. 1, Thomasius, loc. cit. §§111-13, J. H. Bochmer, P. spec. i, c. 5, iii, c. 1, Schmier, v, c. 1, s. 1 and c. 3, s. 1; Kreitmayer, §§32-5.

15 This idea is definitely formulated in e.g. Mevius, Prodromus, iii, §13, cf. also Montesquieu, Esprit des lois, i, c. 2

16 Cf Pufendorf, De off. hom. et civ. i, c. 3, J. n. et g. ii, c. 1, Thomasius, Instit. iur. div. i, c. 4, §§54-72, Beccmann, Med. c. 2, Consp. p. 16, Hertius, Comm. i, i, pp. 61sqq. (de socialitate primo naturalis juris principio), Elem. i, s. 1, J. H. Bochmer, P. gen. c. 1. See also Mevius, iv, §35, and Mueldener, Par. ii, §1, and (to some extent) Fénelon, c. iii and Montesquieu, i, c. 2

*Socialitas
and Societas*

17 Thomasius (Instit. iur. div. i, c. 4) expressly warns his readers against confusing socialitas and societas. As against Hobbes and Spinoza, the advocates of socialitas contend that the state of nature was a state of peace, but they admit that this peace was unstable, and that it might at any moment (as still happens between States) pass into a state of war. Cf Pufendorf, loc. cit., Hertius, ii, 3, pp. 21sqq., Thomasius, Instit. iur. div. i, c. [3], §§51sqq. and c. 4, §§54sqq. (later, however, in Fund. i, c. 3, §55, he states the view that the state of nature was 'neither a state of war nor a state of peace, but a confused chaos', which was like war, yet not without a tendency towards peace), J. G. Bochmer, loc. cit. §38. The transition from mere socialitas to a definite 'society' is ascribed not to the operation of nature, but to reason and free choice, this is the view of Pufendorf, Hertius and Beccmann (loc. cit.). These thinkers also assume that there is no societas among States, cf. Beccmann, loc. cit., and Hertius, ii, 3, pp. 21sqq. A different view, however, appears in Huber (i, 1, c. 5) and in Mevius (v, §§5-9, 18, 20), but they both regard jus gentium as being something more than mere natural law.

*Positive law
based on
Natural Law*

18 The theory appears in Pufendorf, Hertius, Comm. ii, 3, pp. 21sqq.; Gundling, c. 1, §§77-9 and c. 3, J. G. Bochmer, c. 2, §§8sqq., and other writers. Cf also the view of Huber (i, 1, c. 3) that anything opposed to civil society cannot be Natural Law, because the desiderium societas is natural. Strauch (Op. no. 16, de iuris nat. et civ. convenientia) goes still further [in the way of connecting natural and positive law].

*'Pure'
natural Law and 'Social'
natural law*

19. Thus Mevius distinguishes between jus naturale primarium and jus naturale secundarium et voluntariorum. The latter is based on reason itself, and not on the mere fact of agreement, but its rules have to be determined by the principle of 'social conjunction' (v, §§5-9). It is in this latter category that he places international law, assuming the existence of a societas communis inter omnes populos (ibid. §§18-20).

Heineccius admits that natural law, in the narrower sense, refers only to free and equal individuals (i, c 1, II, c 1, §§1-10), but he holds that jus gentium [as distinct from Natural Law in that narrower sense] is ipsum jus naturale vitae hominum sociali negotiis societatum atque integrarum gentium applicatum (i, c 1, §§21-22, II, c 1, §21).

To Daries, the 'moral state of man' is either 'natural' or 'adventitious', and the 'natural moral state', in turn, is either 'absolute' or 'conditional'. Proceeding with his subdivisions, he next lays it down that the absolute state of nature, which is marked by 'liberty' and 'equality', may be either a state of 'solitude' or of 'society', and, in the same way, the conditional state of nature may be either 'non-social' or 'social'. Finally, he classifies the 'civil state' as belonging to the last of these categories [i.e. it is a conditional state of nature of the social type], while he regards the state of the relations in which States stand to one another [i.e. the state of international relations] as a status naturalis absolutus socialis (cf. Præcogn. §§11-28, P spec. §§790sqq.).

Nettelbladt divides the whole body of 'natural jurisprudence' into that which is 'natural strictly so called' and that which is 'natural-social'. In his view, international law is a mixed body of law, composed both of leges gentium stricte naturales and of leges sociales—the reason being that the pure state of nature is here modified by the existence of a 'society constituted by nature' among all peoples (§§1419-24).

Achenwall distinguishes between the jus mere naturale, which is valid in a state of nature, and the jus sociale naturale, which is valid in a state of society, and includes the law of the Family, the law of the State and international law. At the same time, however, he holds that there is a sense in which pure natural law is itself social, for there is a societas universalis or civitas maxima—with God as its natural sovereign, and all men as its natural members—which lays down this jus mere naturale, and thus creates an obligation of sociability (cf. Proleg. §§82-97, i, §1, §§43-4, II, §1).

Hoffbauer has a complicated scheme: (1) He starts from the exalted idea of a 'pure natural law' which is valid for all forms of 'rational existence'—including even other forms than man, if such were known—and is partly 'absolute' (pp. 64sqq.) and partly 'conditional' (pp. 70sqq.). (2) Descending in the scale, he comes next to the 'applied Natural Law' of man (pp. 86sqq.). (3) Here he distinguishes between an 'absolute' form (pp. 108sqq.) and a 'conditional' (pp. 120sqq.). (4) He then divides the conditional form of applied natural law into the 'universal' (pp. 122sqq.) and the 'particular' (pp. 155sqq.). (5) Finally, he subdivides the 'particular conditional form of applied natural law' into the 'extra-social' (pp. 156sqq.) and the 'social' varieties (pp. 186sqq.). Only when he reaches this fifth and last stage in his process of classification does society first appear in his scheme. A final reference may be made to Cumberland, c. 5.

20. Gundling, for example (c. 3, §§11-60), begins with a primitive state of perfect liberty and equality, and explains all forms of connection between human beings as having been constituted by conscious agreement, in consequence of the discoveries made under the pressure of necessity. He describes the status civilis accordingly as a work of art and a status artificiosus. Society as an 'artifice'

Schmier (1, c. 1, s. 1, §§ 1-3) also assumes a state of nature in which free and equal individuals have no form of union, but he believes that the whole of mankind never lived, or could have lived, in a pure state of nature at one and the same time.

Locke's state of nature

21. Locke (Second Treatise, II, c. 2) regards the state of nature as the state which existed previously to the erection of civil society, but he also regards it as a state which still exists in the absence of civil society. From the latter point of view, he depicts the state of nature as a relation of man to man such as still occurs to-day, e.g. when a Swiss and a Red Indian meet in the backwoods of America (§ 14). He also speaks, it is true, of 'natural society'; but the only conclusion he draws from that idea is that men have a negative duty not to disturb or oppress one another (§§ 4-5). That he does not assume the existence of any real community is shown by his remarks about the substance of Natural Law, as something older and higher than all 'social laws' (ibid. § 6, c. 2, §§ 6-13, c. 3, §§ 16-21, c. 5, §§ 25-51, c. 4, §§ 22-4). A similar view is to be found in Sidney, c. 1, ss. 2 and 9, c. II, ss. 1 and 2.

Rousseau's state of nature

22. Rousseau has already attained these ideas in the Discours of 1753, and repeats them in the Contrat Social [of 1762], I, c. 1 ssqq. He admits, indeed, that the Family is a natural society, but only until such time as the children are adults. Filangieri says much the same in the state of nature there was no inequality other than physical, no law other than natural, no bonds other than those of friendship, necessity and the family: alas, that things could not remain as they were (I, c. 1). See also Sieyès, I, pp. 131 ssqq. and 205 ssqq.

Primitive liberty as conceived by German thinkers

23. Thus Justi (Die Natur und das Wesen, §§ 1-18) begins with an original state of nature which was marked by liberty and equality—a state in which men were half animals, and had no natural instinct for social life. Knowledge of the advantages of union first impelled them, after they had attained some degree of reason, to erect some form of society. At first, the existence of such a society imposed no limits on natural liberty, and even to-day that government is still the best which realises the purpose of the State with the fewest possible limitations upon natural liberty. Justi takes a similar line in his Grundriss (§§ 5 ff.), and he interprets international law in a corresponding sense (ibid. §§ 222-3). Frederick the Great, writing in 1777, similarly assumes a pre-political condition, with no society (Oeuvres, IX, p. 195).

In the view of Kreittmayr (§§ 23 ssqq.) the State is not based on jus naturale absolutum, it is based on history, as a res mere facti. Scheidemantel (I, pp. 44 ssqq., 56 ssqq., 68 ssqq.) holds that the State is not a necessity of man's nature, and that the Law of Nature does not impose upon him any binding obligation to renounce his natural liberty. A. L. von Schrözer regards primitive man as homo solitarius, and treats all social institutions as artificial inventions (pp. 31 ff.). Cf. also C. von Schrözer, De jure suff. § 3.

Fichte on the origin of Right or law

24. Grundlage des Naturrechts (1796-7), vol. I, Introduction and pp. 51 ssqq. (Works, III, pp. 7 ssqq. and 17-91), where Fichte argues that the rule of Right, or law,* is deduced without the aid of morality, and yet without any surrender of the unity of law and morality. That unity depends on the living self-consciousness of the Ego. The Ego is one, but in the form of subjective instinct [Trieb]: it produces morality, while in the form of force (as a fact of objective existence) it produces law. In all essentials, Fichte maintains his earlier theory of the origin of the rule of Right in his later System der Rechtslehre [lectures delivered in 1812], printed in his Posthumous Works, II, pp. 495sqq.

* Recht here is more than our English 'law' (1) because, on its 'objective' side, it has a connotation of something inherently 'right' and (2) because it implies, as its other or 'subjective' side, the right of the individual.

25. Works, III, pp. 92sqq. cf. Posthumous Works, II, pp. 500sqq.

26. Works, III, pp. 128sqq. The original rule of Right is 'the absolute right of the personality to be nothing but a cause in the world of thought', i.e. the right of the absolute will, but the original rights of different persons cancel one another, unless each person limits himself.

27. Works, III, pp. 92sqq. It is not an 'absolute', but a 'problematical' command.

28. Works, III, pp. 92sqq., 140sqq., 166sqq. Subsequently, however, Fichte came to regard the existence of a legal community as an 'absolute law of the reason' and a 'necessity of thought', and he accordingly made the rule of Right issue in an obligation to make and keep contracts. But he still continued to hold the firm conviction that 'a state of law is never produced by mere nature . without art and free will, or without a contract' (Posthumous Works, II, pp. 495-500).

29. Works, III, pp. 137-49. Posthumous Works, II, p. 499. The Law of Nature is not law proper, inasmuch as the Ego is absolute, Natural Law has no sanctions other than loyalty and good faith, which lie outside the bounds of law any right of compulsion which each can exert upon each is not enough [to constitute a genuine legal sanction]. On the other hand Right or law which is sanctioned by the force of the State is never Right unless it is based on reason. Both propositions are therefore true (1) that 'all law is purely the law of reason' and (2) that 'all law is the law of the State'.

30. Cf. Works, VII, pp. 8sqq., and see also, on the relation of law to Kant on law morality, pp. 11sqq., 15sqq., 26sqq. and 182sqq., in which a particularly strong emphasis is laid on external compulsion as the essential attribute of law.

31. Works, VII, pp. 62sqq., §§ 14-17, p. 131, § 45.

32. Works, VI, pp. 320, 415, VII, p. 54, §§ 8, p. 130, § 44, p. 107, § 41. Fichte also used this principle in order to deduce from it a duty of States still living in a state of nature (in their external relations to one another) to form some union, cf. VI, pp. 415sqq., VII, p. 162, § 54, p. 168, § 61.

33. Works, VII, pp. 20, 133. The will of the rational individual is its own legislator, but when it proceeds to enact a law for itself, it should always adopt a maxim which is qualified to be a universal law.

34. Works, VI, pp. 329, 409, VII, p. 133, § 47.

35. On the position of Right or law before the State exists, see Works, VII, p. 130, § 44.

On the State's obligation to respect the law of Reason which is given a priori, Kant on the see VI, pp. 338, 413, VII, pp. 34, 131, § 45, p. 136, § 49. On the inviolability State and the of the principles of the liberty, equality, and independence of every individual, law of Reason and on the illegality of institutions (such as slavery, and also hereditary nobility) which are contrary to these principles, see VI, pp. 322sqq., 416sqq., VII, pp. 34sqq., 147sqq.

36. See Pufendorf, De off. hom. et civ. I, c. 12, §§ 2-3, J. n. et g. IV, c. 4, Kant on §§ 1-14, c. 5, §§ 2-10, Thomasius, Inst. iur. div. II, c. 9, §§ 58-95, Fund II, c. 10, property §§ 5-7; J. H. Boehmer, P. spec. II, c. 10, Heineccius, I, c. 9, Wolff, Instit. § 191. Nettelbladt, §§ 208sqq., Achenwall, I, §§ 106-8, 116 (omnes res nullius, usus omnium), Kant, vn, pp. 49, 57, 61, 66 (Kant accepts communio fundi originaria, as a principle involving an original common ownership of the surface of the earth, but he does not believe in a communio primaria, in the sense of a community of property erected at a point of time and contractually established by the pooling of private possessions.)

*Survivals of original
community*

87. See e.g. Pufendorf, J. n. et g. IV, cc. 4-6 and viii, c. 5, §7, on the remnants of the original community of property which may still be traced in the right of the State to ownerless things and in its dominium eminens; Wolff, Instit. §§300-12, on the continuance of 'primitive community' in regard to res usus inexhausti and the sea, and again in the case of jus necessitatis and jus inveniendi utilitatis; and Nettelbladt, §§471 sqq.

88. Wolff (§§194 sqq.), though he has previously depicted the original community of property as negative, sees no objection to making private property develop out of it by an act of division which is due to supervening needs, and is thus compatible with the law of nature.

*Locke on
property*

89. According to Locke (II, c. 5, §§25-51) the individual may acquire property by a legitimate title in the state of nature. Though all things are common, he has a private right in his person, and he may thus acquire things [for himself by annexing them to his person, i.e.] by means of labour, which also includes occupation. No contract or law need precede such acquisition; but limits are set to the acquisition of private property in virtue of Natural Law (1) by the measure of the individual's own need, and (2) by the requirement that there shall be a supply of equal and equally good things for all. (Locke thinks that these conditions are satisfied so far as land is concerned.)

*General view
that property is pre-social*

40. See Heineccius, I, c. 9, Schmauer, I, c. 1, §2, §3, Nettelbladt, §§215 sqq., Achenwall, I, §§110 sqq. (private property comes into existence by 'conditional Natural Law' [cf. n. 19 supra], first by way of occupation, and then in v. of c.)

The French physiocrats (Quesnay, Mercier de la Riviére, Dupont de Nemours and Turgot) are especially emphatic in proclaiming the origin of private property in the state of nature, and the duty of the State to recognise it in virtue of les lois naturelles de l'ordre social, cf. Roscher's Wirtschaftsgeschichte, pp. 480 sqq., and Janet's Histoire de la Science politique, II, pp. 684 sqq.

Rousseau on property

41. Rousseau, Contr. soc. I, c. 9, but the theory already appears in the Discours [of 1753]. Rousseau, however, regards the establishment of private property by an act of appropriation in the state of nature as a usurpation, which is only legitimised when, in the act of concluding the social contract, all men surrender to the sovereign all their belongings as well as their powers, and receive them back again from the sovereign as legal possessions under the limits determined by the law of the community.

*Möser on property as the basis of
the State*

42. Justus Möser always treats property in land as the basis of perfect liberty. he regards land-owners as the 'original contracting parties' of the State, and other owners as shareholders in the State-partnership (in which originally the shares were only shares in land, though later there came to be also shares in money), and he therefore considers them to be the only fully qualified citizens (cf. his Patriot. Phant. II, no. 1, m, no. 62, IV, no. 43).

*Kant on primitive
property*

43. According to Kant (Works, vn, pp. 53 sqq. and 62 sqq.) there is already a real, if only provisional, meum and tuum in the state of nature, which first acquires a title of prescription [peremptio] and a guarantee in the civil state, cf. also pp. 56 sqq. and 64, on occupation as an original method of acquisition (but one which only exists in so far as the possession thus acquired can be actually defended)

44 Thus Mevius (Prodromus, v, § 42) derives private property from an act of concession by a societas civilis (under reservation for cases in which the societas itself is in need). Horn (n, cc. 3-4 and 6) ascribes its origin to an act of distribution by the sovereign, who has received authority from God for that purpose [cf. Paley, Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy, Book III, c. IV], and who continues to enjoy a real 'eminent domain'. Bossuet (1, art 3, prop. 4) finds its source in a creative act of the government, and Alberti (c. 7, § 19) derives it from a direct declaration of will by the community, which at one and the same time establishes property and the limits of property.

45. Pufendorf (loc. cit.) requires a pactum tacitum to bring private property into existence, and Gundling (c. 3, §§ 27-31, 39-42, and c. 20) makes dominium, like imperium, originate in a 'pact'. Similarly A. L. von Schlozer argues (p. 46, § 11) that rightful acquisition of property first becomes possible after its original community has been abolished by contract, for even occupation, and the appropriation of things by labour, were only admitted as proper titles after other persons had 'renounced their joint right therein' (p. 49).

46 According to the theory originally developed by Fichte in his Naturrecht (Works, III, pp. 210sqq.), but also maintained in his later period property (Posthumous Works, pp. 528sqq., 592sqq., 594sqq.), property arises from a contract of property, which is to be regarded as a part of the political contract, and thus it becomes possible only after the original right of each man to everything has been removed by an act of renunciation. Even so, however, 'absolute' property only exists in money and the value of money in exchange (in his Rechtslehre Fichte makes it also include house property), property in land still remains subject to obligations and limitations, and is only a 'relative' species of property. What is true of the right to own land is also true of the right to practise trade and industry, and the State has therefore to distribute rights of pursuing trades among its members, and to organise their industry, in order to satisfy the claim which all men have to subsistence. This constitutes the basis on which Fichte subsequently erected (in 1800) his theory of Der geschlossene Handelsstaat ('the close Trading-state'), with its economic omnipotence [cf. W. Wallace, Lectures and Essays, pp. 427sqq.]

47 In Germany Praschus is conspicuous for his advocacy of the fundamentally social character of Natural Law. The primary principle of that law, he holds, is love, and the greatest of the duties based on that principle is devotion to others and especially to the whole. Society is God's will; it is, even more than the individual, the mirror of the Trinity, and the aim of nature's plan is not the individual, but society, cf. § 9, ad triplex de ut et amplitudine juris socialis, p. 47. The view of Placcius (Book I) is similar. Mevius (v, § 4), Becker (§§ 5 and 12) and Alberti (c. 2, § 9 and c. 10, § 1) also assume the existence of an original community, of which traces continue still to exist in civil society.

According to Kestner, the source of Natural Law and society is not socialitas or consensus, but the will of God (c. 1). Originally there existed a primitive societas humana which God had founded, the imperium in this society belonged to 'all mankind', and coercion was applied to misdoers by caeteri collectus.

Property as State-created

Property as based on contract

Theories of Society as original and divine

sumpts (c. 7, §2). After the disintegration of this unity the imperium, which 'hitherto belonged to all without distinction', passed to the separate 'societies' which were now established (c. 7, §3).

The two Cocceji (Henry and Samuel) similarly reject the principle of 'sociality', and base all social authority on the power over individuals originally bestowed by God on the whole body of mankind at large—a power which subsequently passed to separate peoples, when they arose, and from them in turn passed to their rulers. Later, however, Samuel Cocceji developed the view that political authority arises from the imperium over its own members originally bestowed by God on each family as a corpus—this imperium being afterwards transferred, with the aid of God's intervention, to the union of heads of families, and then in turn from this union to a Ruler (Novum syst. §§280, 612-13).

In France we find Bossuet regarding société as the état primitif, and explaining the origin of diverses nations, as sociétés civiles, by the human passions which led to the disintegration of the primitive fraternal union of all mankind (1, art. 1-2).

In England, we find Filmer, in his Patriarcha, deriving all social authority from inheritance of the patria potestas bestowed by God upon Adam.

48 This individualism appears in Mevius (v, §§23, 25), Alberti (loc. cit.), Kestner (op. cit. §3), S. Cocceji (Nov. syst. III, §§199-207, where the theory of a contract is adopted). Thomasius, in spite of his assumption that there originally existed, in statu integro, a community between God and man and a community of all men with one another, and that this double community was the source of a social law of nature (1, c. 2, §§27-43 and 51-54), none the less applies the individualistic theory of contract in his Institutes of Divine Law, and in his later writings he drops his whole theory of the status integer, on the ground that such a state is beyond our knowledge.

49 Leibniz derives the existence of law from the community, and regards all communities as organic parts of the Kingdom of minds in the Universe at large, which constitutes a world-State under God's government (Bruchstück vom Naturrecht, in Guhrauer, 1, pp. 414sqq., and Introduction to the Cod. dipl. jur. gent., in Dutens' edition of his Works, IV, 3, pp. 287sqq.). At the same time he defines the State as a contractual association (Caesar-Fürst. c. 10), he makes the basis of punishment consist in the promise made by each individual to observe laws and legal decisions (Nov. meth. n, §19), and he regards conventio populi as the source of the validity of all civil law (ibid. §71).

The idea of society as something naturally given still survives in the theory of Wolff, and it even leads him to think that peoples living in a state of nature form a natural society, which, as civitas maxima, possesses an imperium universale (Instit. §1090). But his whole argument proceeds, none the less, on the assumption of equal, free, and independent individuals (Instit. §§70 and 77, Jus nat. 1, §§268sqq.).

50 Esprit des lois, 1, cc. 1-3. Natural laws exist before man and before society: pure natural law is valid for un Homme avant l'établissement des sociétés, and it produces, first the desire for peace, then the satisfaction of the needs of sustenance, then the beginnings of connection, and finally a désir de vivre en société. In society, because the feeling of weakness and equality disappears, wars arise, both within and without; and these produce on the one hand international law, and on the other a civil law which varies considerably [from one State to another], according to circumstances.

51. See Moser's Osnabrück History and his Patriotic Fantasies supra, n. 42. For his objection to the law of Reason see esp. Patriot Phant. IV, no. 30, 'on the important distinction between actual and formal law'.

52. Vico starts from God and human nature he believes that the primitive ideas of bonum and aequum continue to survive, even after the Fall, as Vico and Ferguson ideas of justice and sociability, and he regards utility not as the source, but only the occasion, of law and society.

Ferguson, rejecting the supposed state of nature and the original contracts, prefers to take men as he finds them, i.e. as living in society, and he regards social progress not as the opposite of nature, but as its consummation (Essay, I, c. 1). But he too is inconsistent, and having rejected contract and a state of nature, he proceeds to ascribe the historical beginning of society to the operation of two instincts—the instinct of affection which unites, and that of independence which divides (ibid cc. 3-4).

53. Herder's Ideen zur Geschichte der Menschheit, IX, c. 4

54. Cf. supra, p. 46 and nn. 60 and 61 to § 14; Schmier, II, c. 1, § 3, §§ 1-3; Heincke, I, c. 2, §§ 9-11.

55. Thus Bossuet (I, art. 3, prop. 1-6), in agreement with Hobbes, holds that the State first comes into existence through the complete and irrevocable subjection of all men to one sovereign, under the compulsion of nature, previously there had only been an anarchical sort of multitude, which possessed no sovereignty before this act of subjection, just as it possesses none afterwards. Unlike Hobbes, however, he ascribes the origin of sovereignty to the will of God, and not to a contractual act of surrender of rights. A similar view is to be found in Fénelon, chap. vi cf. also Alberti, c. 14, § 3.

56. Horn, II, c. 1 for further details see the author's work on Althusius, pp. 70-71.

57. Cf. supra, nn. 47-49 and 52-3 to this section.

58. Cf. supra, p. 60, Spinoza, Tract. theol.-pol. c. 16, Tract. pol. cc. 3-4, Gundling, J. n. c. 35 and Disc. c. 34.

59. Cf. supra, p. 46, and n. 63 to § 14, Locke, II, c. 7, §§ 87-9 (the surrender by all of their natural right to self-help, and the surrender of power to the community, constitute civil society) and also c. 12, Sidney, I, s. 10, II, ss. 4, 5 and 20 (all society is constituted by the free association of individuals, who 'recede from their own right').

60. Cf. supra, p. 46, and n. 63 to § 14, Huber, I, 2, c. 1, Pufendorf, J. n. et g. VIII, cc. 2-3, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6; Thomasius, Instit. jur. div. III, c. 6, Hertius, Comm. I, 1, p. 286, § 1 (societas multorum hominum mutuas eorundem pactis conflat, et potestate instructa), Beccmann, cc. 5-6, J. G. Wachter, Orig. p. 34 (civitas nihil aliud quam multitudine hominum majoris utilitatis et securitatis gratia potentias agendi suas naturales invicem jungentur ad producendum mutuan et communem felicitatem), J. H. Boehmer, P. spec. I, c. 1, Heiniccius, II, §§ 14, 109sqq., Wolff, Instit. § 836, Daries, Praecon. § 24, P. spec. § 655 (tum voluntates tuu tures in unam transtulerunt personam vel physicam vel moralem), Nettelbladt, Syst. nat. § 115; Achenwall, II, §§ 2, 9, 11, Kreitnayr, § 2.

61. Contr. soc. I, c. 6 (l'aliénation totale de chaque associé avec tous droits à toute la communauté), III, c. 18, IV, c. 2.

62. Contr. soc. II, c. 5. The individual, it is true, has no right to commit Rousseau on suicide, but he has a right de risquer sa vie pour la conserver. On this principle, punishment we may say that the man who is willing to preserve his life at the cost of others must also risk losing it for the sake of others, if that be necessary. His life, after the conclusion of the contract, is no longer a simple bienfait de la nature, mais un don constitutionnel de l'État—the sovereign has now a share in deciding when it is to be sacrificed. Thus even capital punishment has a basis in consent, though it is also a sort of war against un ennemi public.

68. Beccaria, §2. In addition to the argument derived from the fact that suicide is wrong, Beccaria also presses into his service the assumption that the individual, in entering civil society, desired to incur the least possible sacrifice of his liberty.

64. Even Montesquieu himself had suggested no other way [of explaining social authority], for according to the Esprit des lois (I, c. 3) la réunion de toutes les forces particulières forme ce qu'on appelle l'État politique les forces particulières ne peuvent pas se réunir sans que toutes les volontés se réunissent, la réunion de ces volontés est ce qu'on appelle l'État civil.

Similarly Justi (Natur und Wesen, §§23–6) contends that the act of union in a moral body, which constitutes the moral basis of the State, depends on the union of many wills in a single will, and of all individual powers in a single power, thus is the difference between the State and the state of nature, in which each will stands by itself.

A. L. von Schlözer (pp. 63sqq and 93, §1) and C. von Schlözer (§11) both insist on the origin of the State in a uno virsum, which produces society, and a una voluntatum, which creates authority.

65. Cf. Justus Moser, Patriot Phant III, no. 62, on 'peasant properties considered as a form of share-holding'. All civil societies, he argues, are like share-companies—the citizen is one who is a shareholder. Originally there were only shares in land [cf. supra, n. 42]; subsequently, money-shares came into existence also, and nowadays all belongings, and even our bodies, are part of the capital. A slave [Knecht] is a man without a 'share' in the State, and therefore without losses or profits, but this contradicts religion no more than it does to be in the East India Company without holding a share. The basis of civil society is an express or tacit contract of society between the associated owners of land, who invest their properties as whole or half or quarter shares, and a body of directors is instituted for the purpose of keeping up and getting in the contributions of II, no. 11.

Compare also Sieyès (1789), I, pp. 283sqq. and 445sqq. Individuals constitute a nation, as shareholders a company; the active citizens are 'the true shareholders in the great social undertaking', and the passive citizens (wives, children and foreigners) are only protected persons. Sieyès is never tired of repeating that political authority is 'constituted' by individuals, and only by individuals, and that the individual will forms the only element in the general will (cf. I, pp. 145, 167, 207, 211, II, pp. 374sqq.).

66. In his Beiträge of 1793 ['Contribution to the judgment of public opinion on the French Revolution'], Fichte derives the State, as he also derives law, from the individual will, since 'no man can rightfully be bound except by himself' (Works, VI, pp. 80sqq., cf. also pp. 101, 103sqq., 115sqq.). In the same way he makes the beginning of the State, under the régime of Natural Law, depend on contracts, under which individuals agree to pool a part of their rights—renouncing the residue of their property in return for the guarantee of a fixed part, and pledging themselves to pay a fixed contribution to the protecting authority (Works, III, p. 207, cf. II, pp. 109sqq. and III, pp. 269sqq.).

In his Grundzüge of 1804–5 ['The Characteristics of the present Epoch']

we find a change: the State is not to be interpreted, 'as if it were based on this or that set of individuals, or as if it were based on individuals at all, or composed of them' (Works, vii, p. 146).

67. See Kant's Rechtslehre, § 47 (Works, vii, p. 133), on 'the original contract by which all the members of a people (omnes ut singulis) surrender their external liberty, in order to receive it back again at once as members of a commonwealth, i.e. of the people regarded as a State (universum)'. [Kant adds that the individual, by this seeming surrender, 'has totally abandoned his wild lawless freedom in order to find his entire freedom again undiminished in a lawful dependence, that is, in a condition of right or law—undiminished, because this dependence springs from his own legislative will'.]

68. This is the theory which appears in Huber, 1, 2, cc 1-2 (with a division of the contract of association into the three stages of a treaty of peace, a union of wills and the formation of a constitution, c 1, §§1-13), Beermann, c. 12, §4, J H Bochmer, 1, c 1, Wolff, Instit §§972sqq, Jus nat. viii, §§45sqq, S Cocceji, Nov. iust. iii, §§612sqq and 616sqq, Daries, P spec. §659, Nettelbladt, §§1124sqq; Heincke, 1, c 2, §§1sqq, Scheidentmantel, 1, pp 63sqq.

According to A L von Schlozer, pp 63sqq and 73sqq, the civil society established by the pactum unionis lasts for centuries without any government or coercion, until disturbances appear and the State is erected by a pactum subjectionis, cf. also pp 95, 96 and 173sqq.

The distinction between the two contracts finds an echo also in Justi, Natur und Wesen, §§23-7.

In Sidney (c 1, ss 8, 10, 11, 16, 20, c 11, ss 4, 5, 7, 20, 31, and c 111, ss 18, 25, 31) and Locke (ii, c 7, §§87sqq, c 8) the contract of subjection recedes into the background in comparison with the contract of union, but it is by no means entirely abandoned. [More exactly, we may say that Locke uses the conception of Trust, and not that of Contract, to explain 'subjection'. The trust is a conception peculiar, or at the whole, to English law. In private law [Privatrecht] the trust means that A, as trustor, vests rights in B, as trustee, for the benefit of C, as cestus que trist or beneficiary of the trust. In public law [Staatsrecht], to which Locke may be said to transfer the doctrine of trust, the People or 'Public' (which is both the trustor and the cestus que trust) acts in its capacity of trustor by way of conferring a 'fiduciary power' on the legislature (which thus becomes a trustee), for the benefit of itself, and all its members, in its other capacity of cestus que trust or beneficiary of the trust. This 'trust' conception pervades English political thought in the eighteenth century, not only is it applied internally, to the relations between the Public and the 'supreme legislature', it is also applied (for example by Burke) externally, to the relations between Great Britain and India, which is regarded as held in trust for the benefit of the people of India.]

A trust is not a contract, and the trustee does not enter into relations of contract with the trustor—or with the beneficiary. Roughly, he may be said to consent to incur a unilateral obligation—an obligation to the beneficiary which, if it implies the trustee's possession and vindication of rights against other parties on behalf of that beneficiary, implies no rights for the trustee himself on his own behalf. If therefore political power be regarded as a trust, it follows that the Sovereign has not entered into a contract with the People, or the People with him—whether we regard the People as trustor or as beneficiary of the trust. The trust, in its application to politics, leaves no room for a 'contract of subjection'. We may say that Locke did not assign a contractual position to the sovereign because it would have given him rights of his own, derived from the contract, and he had no wish to vest the sovereign with eigenes Recht. Conversely we may say that Hobbes (who equally leaves no room for a 'contract of subjection') did not assign a contractual position to the People because it would have given it rights of its own, and he had no wish to vest the People with eigenes Recht]

Kant bases the State on individuals

The Two Contract theory

[Locke's theory of Trust]

69. See Pufendorf, De off. hom. et civ II, c. 6, J. n. et g. vii, cc. 2 and 5, §6. The same intercalation of constitution-making appears in Thomasius, Inst. iur. div. III, c. 6, §§29-31; Hertius, Elem. I, s. 3, De modo const. s. 1, §§2-3; Schmier, I, c. 2, s. 4, §3; Kestner, c. 7, §3; Heiniccius, II, c. 6, §§109-12; Ickstatt, §§11-12.

70. This is the view of Achenwall, II, §§91-8, and of Hoffbauer, pp. 187-207.

71. See supra, p. 60 and n. 147 to §14; cf. also Spinoza, Tract. theol.-pol. c. 16, Tract. pol. c. 5, §6, cc. 6, 7, §26, c. 11, §§1-4. The same view appears in Houtuyenus, Pol. gen. §§99, no. 14, Titius, Spec. iur. publ. VII, c. 7, §§178sqq. and note to Pufendorf, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, §8; Gundling, J. nat. c. 35 and Disc. c. 34, §§1-17.

72. Cf. Rousseau, I, cc. 5-6 and III, cc. 1, 16-18 (with the author's work on Althusius, pp. 116-17 and p. 347 n. 50). Frederick the Great also believes in a constituent pacte social (Oeuvres, IX, pp. 195sqq., 205), and the idea also appears in Filangieri, loc. cit., Moser, Patriot. Phant. II, nos. 1 and 62, and Sieyès, I, pp. 129sqq. The contractual theory of Fichte also supposes only a single contract of all men with all men, the 'contract of state-citizenship', but this single contract is composed of three fundamental contracts—that of 'property', that of 'protection', and that of 'association' (Works, III, pp. 1sqq. and 191sqq., but in the Posthumous Works, II, pp. 499sqq., his view is somewhat different). Kant always interprets the political contract as a single pactum unionis civilis; Works, VI, p. 320, VII, p. 133.

73. This is the line of thought which appears in Huber, I, 2, c. 1, §§1-5qq. (man's innate idea of justice and his natural desire for society both impel him to the making of contracts, which remain, however, free acts of his will), Schmier, I, c. 2, s. 4, §2 (although the natural instinct for company which God has planted in man impels him towards society and the State, it is a matter of liberty for the individual whether inter socios sese jungere et alienum imperium agnoscere velit) S. Coccejus, op. cit. III, §200 (natura mediate per pacta), Heincke, I, c. 1, §§1-5qq. (ipsa lex naturalis is the causa impulsiva, and pactum the modus constituendi) The same is also true, to a certain extent, of Grotius, and of all the advocates of the theory of 'sociability', cf. supra, n. 16 to this section.

74. See Hobbes, De civ., c. 1sqq., Leviathan, cc. 13-14, Gundling, Jus nat. c. 35, Disc. c. 34; Kestner, c. 7, §3; Daries, §657. Similar ideas are to be found in Thomasius, Inst. iur. div. III, c. 1, §§4-10 and III, c. 6, §§2-28 (it is not an impulsus internum which brings the State into being—for nature impels men, on the contrary, towards liberty and equality—but the impulsus externus of fear and necessity). Compare Scheidemantel, I, pp. 44-70 (the foundation of States is due in the first place to fear, and secondarily to other impulses leading men to renounce their natural liberty, but it is only achieved by free legal action).

J. H. Bochmer (P. spec. I, c. 1) thinks the primary cause of the founding of States to be violentia improborum, first producing bands of robbers, and then associations for mutual defence against these bands, and a similar view occurs in Heineccius, II, c. 6, §§ 100-4, and in Kreittmayr, § 3.

75. Thus Pufendorf regards socialitas as the primary and metus as the secondary cause of the founding of States, but he makes consent the constitutive factor, J. n. et g. II, cc. 1-2, VIII, c. 1, De off. hom. et civ. II, cc. 1, 5 Cf. also Locke, II, c. 7, §§ 87 sqq. and c. 9

76. Kant, Works, VI, pp. 320, 415, VII, pp. 54, 62 sqq., 130, 162, 168

77. Just as Althusius had already insisted (Polit. c. 1, §§ 28-9) that union in a civil society came about ultra citroque, so the voluntary character of the conclusion of a contract is strongly emphasised, on the one hand by [the absolutists] Hobbes, Spinoza, Gundling, etc., and on the other by [the radicals] Sidney, c. II, s. 5, and Locke, II, c. 8, §§ 95 and 99. Wolff (Instit. § 972) and Achenwall (II, § 93) also speak of the liberum arbitrium which is the decisive factor in the foundation of society. Pufendorf (J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, § 7 and De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, § 7), Schmier (see n. 73 to this section) and many other writers expressly reserve the right of every individual to stand aloof and remain in the state of nature. J. H. Boehmer denies the 'absolute necessity' of forming a State. Schedemann (I, pp. 68 sqq.) thinks that the State is not a necessity of human nature, and that the law of nature imposes no inevitable duty of surrendering liberty. It is only in certain circumstances that the State is necessary. Rousseau (Contr. soc. I, c. 6) insists even more upon liberty. He goes to the length of proclaiming (ibid. IV, c. 2) that l'association civile est l'acte du monde le plus volontaire the man who opposes it cannot be compelled to join, but he is étranger parmi les citoyens. The same view recurs in Moser, A. L. von Schlozer and Sieyès, but Fichte goes furthest, holding that it is inconceivable that there should ever be any other legislator for an individual than his own will and his own deliberate and permanent purpose (Works, VI, pp. 80 sqq. and 101), and that the conclusion of the contract of State-citizenship is therefore purely a matter of free will (Works, III, p. 201).

78. According to Hobbes, Beccaria, Gundling, etc., but equally also according to Rousseau (Contr. soc. I, c. 6), an understanding of the impossibility of the state of nature precedes the formation of the contract. In Spinoza (Tract. theol.-pol. c. 16, Tract. pol. cc. 3-4) reason takes a foremost place. In Sidney (II, s. 4), Locke (II, cc. 7, 9), Wolff (Jus nat. VIII, §§ 1 sqq.) and Achenwall (II, § 93), a process of deliberation and reflection, leading to a sense of the utility of social life, is supposed. A. L. von Schlozer speaks of the State as 'invented'. In Fichte and Kant reason rules in full sovereignty.

79. Cf. supra, p. 105

80. Cf. supra, p. 106.

81. Cf. supra, pp. 106-107.

82. This is an admission which appears in Huber, I, 2, c. 1, §§ 33-5 ('on occasions'), Pufendorf, J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, § 20 and De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, § 13, Titius, Spec. iur. publ. IV, c. 10, §§ 2 sqq., VII, c. 7, §§ 17 sqq., and Notes to Pufendorf's De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, § 8, Schmier, I, c. 2, s. 4, § 3, no. 188; Locke, II, c. 8, §§ 101-12, Heincke, I, c. 2, §§ 2 sqq. ('as a rule'), Justi, Natur und Wesen, § 27 (contracts, resolutions and decrees are not essential rules came into being afterwards, for the most part gradually and tacitly).

83. Cf. Huber, I, c. 1, §§ 14-26, Hertius, De modo const. s. 1, §§ 4-5, p. 289, Force and Sidney, c. 3, s. 31 (until consent is there, the union only exists de facto), consent

*General view
that society is the result of a free legal act*

The act a calculated act of reason

The idea of a tacit contract

Locke, II, c. 8, c. 17 (until that time, there is only the appearance of a society); Achenwall, II, §98. Cf. also Rousseau, I, c. 3, Heineccius, II, c. 6, §§106 and 113, and A. L. von Schlozer, p. 95, §2.

Schedemann, on the other hand (I, pp. 65sqq.) regards war, along with contract, as a rightful way of founding a State, cf. also Daries, §659, and Heincke, I, c. 2, §8.

The contract as 'an idea of reason'

84. Cf. Kant, Works, VI, pp. 329, 334, 416sqq., VII, p. 133. A similar theory already appears in Beermann, Consp. p. 13, and in Kreitmayer, §3. Thomasius also suggests (in Fund. III, c. 6, §§2-6) that down previously, I

*io quasi continuo a *ex facta fuit

these line

from the c. 8, advanced by several writers, that the social contract is for R. 100 [as well as for ant] only an 'idea' [i.e. only a logical postulate, and not a time]—with regard to the extent to which the social contract had been already interpreted in a purely 'ideal' sense before the day of Kant. See, in this matter, the Addendum to p. 121 of the author's work on Althusius (pp. 347-50 of the 2nd and 3rd editions).

85. Cf. supra, pp. 47sqq., nn. 72-4 to §14, Pufendorf, J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, §§7 and 15, c. 5, §6, and De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, §§7, 12, Thomasius, Inst. jur. div. III, c. 6, §64, Locke, II, c. 8, §§97sqq., Rousseau, IV, c. 2, Hoffbauer, p. 240.

86. The question is raised most vigorously by Fichte, Works, III, pp. 16, 164, 178sqq., 184sqq.

87. Pufendorf (J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, §20 and De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, §13) regards subjection as incumbent without any question on later generations, and it is only the subjection of fresh immigrants which he refers to a 'tacit pact' concluded at the time of their entry into the country. The same view occurs in Hertius, De modo const. I, §§7-8, and in Titius, loc. cit.

Locke, on the other hand, rejects the idea that descendants are bound by the act of their ancestors, and he assumes a free act of agreement with the State, at the time of coming of age, which is evidenced by remaining in the country (II, c. 8, §§113-22). Similarly Rousseau writes (IV, c. 2), quand l'Etat est institué, le consentement est dans la résidence. Cf. Hoffbauer, pp. 189 and 242sqq.

88. Pufendorf, Schmier, Locke, Rousseau and other writers, who expressly emphasise the right of individuals to keep aloof from contracts and to remain in the state of nature, none the less admit that when once accession has been expressly or tacitly declared, it is binding for life (supra, nn. 73, 77 and 78). Rousseau (III, c. 18) argues that it is only the sovereign community which can at any time annul the contract.

Fichte, however, argues that not only can a civil society itself alter its constitution at any time in spite of any provision in the contract to the opposite effect (Works, VI, pp. 103sqq.), but each individual can also secede from the society at any time by virtue of his own free inalienable will, since it is the 'inalienable right of man to annul his contracts, even by unilateral act, as soon as he wills to do so' (pp. 115sqq. and 159). In the same way a number of persons have the like right, and if they exercise it, their relations to the State are thenceforth only relations of natural law, so that they can conclude a new civic contract, and are thus able to erect a 'State within the

Contract renewed by each generation

Freedom to renounce the contract

State' at will (ibid. pp. 148sqq), the famous example of such a procedure given by Fichte is the 'European State' of the Jews, but 'partial' examples which he cites are the army, the nobility and the hierarchy)

89. After Althusius had generalised the theory of a social contract [i.e. applied it to all forms of association], in a radical sense, and after Grotius had accepted this generalisation with some modifications, and Hobbes had incorporated it into his absolutist system (supra, § 15, pp. 62-92), the thinkers who succeeded them—Pufendorf, Thomasius, J. H. Boehmer, Wolff, Daries, Nettelbladt, Achenwall, Hoffbauer, etc.—continued to follow this line of thought. We must admit one exception. Rousseau's conception of the political contract [as the one and only contract] leaves no room whatsoever for other forms of social contract [resulting in societies other than the State].

90. See below. [Gierke's reference is perhaps to the intended section, which was never written, on die Korporationstheorie im Kirchenrecht. As his work stands, there is only a slight reference to the Church at the end of § 18, p. 198.]

91. To meet the case of the Family, a category of 'necessary societies' was often added to the category of 'voluntary societies' in which the State and the Church were both included of e.g. Daries, § 549, Nettelbladt, § 332, Achenwall, II, § 9. Many thinkers also included the societas gentium among the necessary societies which were not dependent for their origin on an act of will of Thomasius, Inst. jur. div. III, c. 1, §§ 4-10, and Daries, § 549. But the difficulty of ascribing the origin of the Family-association, like that of other associations, to an act of contract, was often quietly evaded, and without further ado contract was declared to be the one and only source of all forms of social obligation—cf. Hoffbauer, p. 187, C. von Schlozer, § 3, Fichte, Works, VI, pp. 80sqq. Wolff takes this line (Inst. § 836), but he prudently mentions quasi-contract in addition to contract proper.

92. Thomasius (Inst. jur. div. III, c. 1, §§ 4-10), Schmier (I, c. 2, ss. 1-3), Gundling (c. 3, §§ 49-55 and cc. 26sqq), and other writers still continue to treat societas paterna and societas nuptialis as being both equally non-contractual societies, while they regard societas herilis [the 'society' of master and servant—the third of the three sub-groups which together constitute the Family] as derived from contract. But Gundling adds that the authority of the father and that of the husband are not true forms of imperium.

Locke (II, c. 6, §§ 52-76) regards only paternal authority—which he holds, however, to be a matter of duty rather than of right—as belonging to the state of nature. Rousseau (I, c. 2) pronounces the Family to be the oldest and the only natural society, but he argues that it continues to be natural only until the children have come of age, and that after that time it depends, like other societies, purely on contract. Most of the writers on natural law specifically include marriage among the societas voluntarie of e.g. Daries, § 549, Nettelbladt, § 333, Achenwall, II, §§ 42-52. This view is expressed most vigorously by W. von Humboldt (p. 121), and he draws from it the conclusion that marriage should be freely dissoluble, the same conclusion appears in Hoffbauer, pp. 209-12.

93. Such theocritical assumptions are to be found in Praschus, Placcius, H. Coccejus and the earlier works of S. Coccejus, cf. supra, n. 47. They are also to be found in Filmer (who derives all authority from the paternal power

*Contract
the basis of all associations*

*The Family
as based on contract*

Theories of the Family

*Theocratic views of the origin
of the State*

bestowed directly by God upon Adam), in ossuet (i, art. 3, prop. 4); and in Fénelon (c. v and conclus. 1). F. C v n Moser, in opposition to the 'dreams' of a social contract, also appeals to the idea of the divine origin of the State (Neues patriot. Archiv, vol. 1), for his view see A. L. von Schlözer, Anhang, pp. 173 sqq.

Horn's attack on the Social Contract

94. Horn attacks both the conceptions of contract. He attacks the conception of the contractual foundation of human society [the Geellschaftsvertrag], on the ground that men had never lived in isolation and had never come together for the first time to make such a contract (i, c. 4, §§ 3-6), and he attacks the conception of the derivation of political authority from an act of contractual devolution [the Herrschaftsvertrag]—whether such devolution be regarded as made by the community (ii, c. 1, §§ 17-18), or by individuals (ibid. § 19)—on the ground that there is no community distinct from the aggregation of individuals, and that individuals had never possessed a sovereignty to devolve. He declares not only the theories of Barclay, Salmasius and Grotius, but also that of Hobbes, to be revolutionary, and a danger to the State, since every pactum made by men can also be unmade. Just as he rejects the social contract as an explanation of the State's origin, so he rejects military force (ibid. c. 13), natural evolution (§ 14), the jus naturale et gentium (§ 15), and necessitas et indigentia (§ 16).

His view of authority as given by God

95. Horn admits that the civitas is constituted 'by nature' alone, but he holds that the republica, which presupposes 'majesty', non natura constitutatur (i, c. 4, §§ 3-6). God Himself is the 'sole and unique and direct cause of majesty', by communicating a part of His own authority to the monarch and thus appointing him 'vicar of God' (ii, c. 1, §§ 4-12). Conquest, election, hereditary succession, and even actual appointment and investiture, are only modi consequendi, and they are destitute of constitutive or creative power (ibid. §§ 13-21). * In the same way the authority of the husband does not depend on any 'devolution' by the wife, sed quamprimum nubit, maritus a Deo constitutus potestatem in uxorem (ibid. § 19).

Yet he admits secular authority in Republics

96. Horn, iii, c. un §§ 1-5. True, genuine 'majesty' never exists in a republic, because such majesty can only be the 'work of Almighty God'. The subjection of individuals in a republican State is limited to the extent of their consent: there is no 'eminent domain', and capital punishment is properly speaking excluded. But by 'pacts and conventions' formed in imitation of monarchy something like subjection is attained in a republic, quod efficaciam communis utilitatis. A substitute is ultimately found even for 'eminent domain', as a result of the societas omnium bonorum into which the citizens of a republic enter; † and capital punishment itself is made possible by treatment of the criminal as an enemy and by the assumption of a previous act of consent to its infliction.

97. This revival of a philosophical theory of the natural origin of the State appears especially among political thinkers with an Aristotelian tend-

* I e. they are ways of acquiring an authority already existing, because already constituted by God, but they do not cause such authority to exist, or constitute it as such.

† In a monarchy, the State's right of 'eminent domain', which enables it to expropriate land for a public purpose, is due to the fact that the King, as God's vicar, possesses God's final ownership. In a republic, the State may still expropriate land, but its right depends on the fact that the citizens have formed themselves into a company and made that company the final owner of the land.

ency of the author's work on Althusius, p. 100 n. 68, Boeckler, I, c. 1, Knichen, I, c. 1, th. 2, c. 8, th. 2, Rachelius, I, tit. 12, § 2 and tit. 14-31.

98. Particularly by Vico and Ferguson (n. 52 supra).

99. This is the case with Leibniz (supra, n. 50) and Montesquieu (supra, n. 51). Even Herder (op. cit. pp. 210-22) does not eliminate contract altogether. It is only the 'first class, that of natural governments', which, in his view, depends upon the natural order of the family: the 'second class' is composed of communities based on 'contract or commissum', and the 'third class' consists 'of hereditary governments over men', which arise from war and force, but are legalised by a 'tacit contract'.

100. Such moderate opposition is to be found in Justi (supra, n. 82).

101. Hume (Essays, II, 6) argues that the duty of obedience to the State cannot be based on a foundation of contract, because the extinct promise of our ancestors no longer binds us to-day, and the assumption that all were born free, and only became members of the State by virtue of their own promise, is contradicted by experience. As a matter of fact, every man feels himself obliged without further question, and his remaining in the country does not depend on his free choice, and cannot therefore be interpreted as an act of consent. The real legal ground of the duty of obedience is the fact that we feel it to be a duty to obey, when once our primitive instincts of disobedience and ambition have been modified by a growing recognition that it is impossible for society to endure without obedience (pp. 269-303).

But Hume regards the making of an original contract, with a provision for resistance, as an actual fact. True we possess no documents to attest the fact, because the contract was made in the woods, before the discovery of writing, and it was not written on parchment or the bark of trees. But we may read it in the nature of man, since the surrender of our natural liberty in favour of our fellows could only come about by voluntary choice, and the beginnings of a government could not arise in the absence of consent (pp. 266-9). Cf also Essays, II, 2.

102. This conception of the purpose of the State appears most definitely in Hobbes and the absolutists who adopted his views, cf. supra, nn. 74 and 78. It also appears in Rousseau, who (I, c. 6) regards the fundamental problem as being 'to find a form of association qua défende et protège de toute la force commune la personne et les biens de chaque associé', without abolishing the liberty and equality of all'. See the author's work on Althusius, p. 345, n. 47, and see also p. 113 infra.

103. This proposition [that the purpose of the State determines the extent of its authority] was never contested by the absolutists, it is the basis of the deductions of Spinoza (Tract. theol.-pol. cc. 16-17 and 20), and it is employed by Rousseau (I, c. 6, II, c. 4). It is expressly formulated by a number of writers—e.g. Hertius, De modo const. s. 1, § 6 (the citizens are not absolutely bound, either to one another or to the Ruler, but only quatenus ad finem societatis obtinendum expedit, since it is not to be supposed that any further obligation has been intended), J. H. Boehmer, P. spec. I, c. 5, §§ 20-30, Wolff, Instit. § 980, Jus. VIII, §§ 35, 37, Pol. § 215, Locke, II, c. 9, § 131, Achenwall, II, §§ 10, 98, Darics, §§ 26 and 780-9 (in all States, certain 'natural limits' on political authority flow from the scopus civitatis: these are the only limits which exist in a civitas necessaria, but limites pactuum may also exist in addition in a civitas voluntaria), Beccaria, § 2, Kreittmayr, §§ 1-2, Scheidermantel, III, pp. 330sqq.

Even Herder uses the idea of Contract

Hume on the Social Contract

Rousseau's view of the purpose of the State

The power of the State limited by its end

Even the absolutists admit limits on the State

104. Cf. Leviathan, c. 21, on the matters which in their nature are not subject to the authority of the State, see also cc. 17-19, 21, 24, 26 and De cive, cc. 5-7, 14. Mevius (Prodomus, VI, §§ 1 sqq.) is like Hobbes in holding that men have submitted everything to the State—including even the rights which they hold by nature—and that no man, therefore, can invoke the law of nature against the State. But he recognises that the dictates of jus naturale and jus divinum in regard to the rights of the individual are objective limits on the exercise of authority by the State. A similar view, though it rests on a different basis, is to be found in Horn, II, c. 2, § 10 and c. 12, §§ 2-13, Bossuet, VI, a. 2 and VIII, a. 2, Fénelon, c. xi.

Spinoza on the State's limits

105. Spinoza regards each individual as having transferred all his power, and thereby omnis ius suum, to the community, which thus possesses absolute power over all men. Tract. theol.-pol. c. 16, Tract. pol. cc. 3-4. But the authority of the State is limited, none the less, by the natural law of its own power. It cannot really issue any command, nor can the subject really transfer everything, inasmuch as he necessarily remains a man, and therefore a being who is spiritually and morally free. More especially, the individual reserves for himself the power of thinking what he likes, and of expressing his opinions orally and in writing. But where the power of the State ends, its right also ends, and reason, which always considers its own interest, impels the State accordingly to limit itself, in order that it may not suffer the loss of its power, and thus of its right, through resistance. In this way the State attains a recognition of the 'dictate of reason'—that its true object is not domination, but liberty. Tract. theol.-pol. cc. 16-17 and 20, Tract. pol. c. 3, §§ 5-9, c. 4, § 4, c. 5, §§ 1-7. [It would thus seem to follow that Spinoza is not, after all, one of the 'absolutists', as has been suggested previously.]

The reader is referred, for an account of the views recently expressed by Menzel [Wandlungen in der Staatslehre Spinoza's, Stuttgart, 1898], which to some extent diverge from those stated here, to the Addenda to the author's work on Althusius [2nd edition], pp. 342 sqq., nn. 39-41, and p. 346 n. 49, and also to the Addenda to the 3rd edition, nn. 54-7. [The English reader may be also referred to Duff, The Moral and Political Ideas of Spinoza.]

106. Contr. soc. I, c. 6 (l'aliénation totale de chaque associé avec tous droits à toute la communauté), cf. also c. 7.

107. Ibid. II, c. 7. Although there can be no legal limits upon the sovereign power of the social body over its members, there are inherent limits arising from the very nature of the general will, of which all individual wills are part, and which can only will what is equal and just for all. Absolute as the sovereign may be, it can never really burden one subject more heavily than another, parce qu'alors l'affaire devenant particulière son pouvoir n'est plus compétent, and thus the individual, in the last resort, has not made any real alienation, but rather an advantageous exchange, receiving back for what he has given a greater security of his liberty, his equality and his life. This is not logic, and it is in vain that Rousseau tries to shelter himself, in a footnote, from a charge of illogicality. The reader is referred, for an account of the vigorous controversy which has arisen recently in regard to Rousseau's attitude to the theory of the rights of man, to the Addenda to the author's work on Althusius [2nd edition], p. 347 n. 50, and to the Addenda to the 3rd edition, n. 63.

108. Sieyès expressly says that societies only exist for the sake of individuals, and that the happiness of individuals is the only object of the social

Rousseau on the rights of man

state Works, II, p. 32, I, pp. 417, 431. But the purpose of the State is also (if only implicitly) made to consist in the happiness of individuals, when it is defined by Hertius (s. 1, § 1) as tranquilla et beata vita, or by Wachter (p. 34) as mutua et communis felicitas, or by Wolff (Instit. § 972 and Jus nat VIII, § 14) as sufficientia vitae, tranquillitas et securitas.

There is less of an individualistic tinge in the formula of Justi (Natur und Wesen, §§ 30-44). He makes 'the common happiness of the whole State' the object of commonwealths and their sovereign law (though he adds that, sovereign as it may be, it can never warrant any action that is unjust in itself) he regards liberty, security and internal strength as the main elements of this happiness, but otherwise he leaves each people free to determine the particular objects of its own life. But even Justi adds that the 'common happiness' consists pre-eminently in the happiness of the subjects, and secondarily of the Ruler.

A. L. von Schlozer (pp. 17 ff.) distinguishes between (1) the fines negativus of the State, which is limited to securing and protecting, as against fellow-citizens, aliens and natural causes, the four kinds of property (in a man's person, his possessions, his honour and his religion), and (2) the fines positivi, which come to be added with the development of civilisation, and are directed to the advancement of prosperity, population and enlightenment (cf. p. 93, § 1).

109 The purpose of the State is defined by Kestner (c. 7, § 4 and Definitions §§ 17sqq.) as justitia colenda, by S. de Coccceji (Nov. syst. §§ 280 and 613), as defensio iurum singulorum, by Heineccius (§ 107), as securitas curum, by Daries (Præcogn. § 24 and P. spec. §§ 656 and 664-6), as securitas, by Hoffbauer (pp. 236sqq.), as legal security, by Scheidemantel (I, p. 70), as 'the attainment of internal and external security by means of united resources', by Klein (u. pp. 55sqq.), as 'protection of social life'. In Filangieri (I, cc. 1-12) the purpose is conservatio et tranquillitas in Mercier de la Rivière, Turgot and the other Physiocrats, it is liberté et sûreté of person and property in Hume (Essays, II, no. 3) it is simply justice, and King, Parliament, ministers and the rest—including even the clergy—properly exist only in order to support the twelve jurymen.

110. Locke (I, c. 9, §§ 123-31), following this idea of 'insurance', denies any other purpose to the State than that of guaranteeing natural rights, particularly the rights of 'liberty and property'.

In the theory of W. von Humboldt the final object of human existence is the development of personality (pp. 9sqq.). The State is only a means for attaining that security of its citizens, and thereby that 'consciousness of legal freedom', which are the indispensable conditions of such development (pp. 16sqq.). Security has to be attained both in regard to enemies without (pp. 47sqq.) and between the citizens themselves (pp. 53sqq.), and therefore the legitimate activities of the State are confined entirely to (1) the enacting of administrative, civil and criminal law, (2) jurisdiction, (3) the care of minors and lunatics, and (4) the provision of the means necessary for maintaining the structure of the State (pp. 100-77). Conversely, the making of any provision for the common good (pp. 44sqq.), and any attempt to influence education, religion or moral improvement (pp. 61sqq.), are injurious.

Kant goes furthest of all in the limitations which he assigns to the purposes of the State. It is confined to realising the idea of Right or law (Works, VI, p. 322 and VII, p. 130), and that realisation must be attained without publica as consisting in the happiness of individuals

Salus

Definitions of the State's purpose

The State
as an insurance
society

reference to the consequences of good or bad which follow [i.e. the idea of impersonal Right must be carried into effect regardless of its effect on the Good of persons], cf. vi, pp. 338, 446, vii, p. 150. Kant expressly attacks the idea of the 'welfare-State'—i.e. the State directed to the well-being of its members—unless such well-being or happiness be understood only to mean a condition in which the constitution is in the greatest possible harmony with the principles of Right, or unless, again, a law which [immediately] aims at some form of happiness (e.g. opulence) is only intended to serve [ultimately] as a means of securing a system of Right, especially against external enemies, cf. vi, pp. 330sqq., vii, p. 136.

111 Cf. e.g. Locke, II, c. 9, § 131 and c. 11, §§ 134sqq., Wolff, Instit. § 74, Sieyès, I, p. 417, II, pp. 3sqq. and 374sqq., Kant, VI, p. 417, VII, p. 34.

112 This theory [of a distinction between 'civil' and 'natural' rights] is already implied in advance by all the doctrines in which, from the Middle Ages onwards, the law of nature is exalted above the State, and it plays an important part in the thought of e.g. Althusius and Grotius. But it was only during the reaction against Hobbes' attempt to annihilate the idea of the natural rights of man that it was formulated as an explicit theory. Huber was particularly responsible for the development of a formal theory of the rights (of person, property, liberty of thought and freedom to follow the divine commands) which must be reserved in all forms of State for the individual, by means of the necessary articles in the contract [of government], and are thus removed from the control of the sovereign cf. De civ. I, 2, cc. 3-5 and I, 3, c. 4. Pufendorf also reserves for the individual, as a man and as a citizen, natural rights which, though they are imperfectly protected as against the sovereign, are still indestructible. Elem. I, d. 12, § 6, J. n. et g. I, c. 1, cc. 8-9, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 5, c. 9, § 4, c. 11. Hertius argues in the same sense, De modo const. I, § 6, and Schmier devotes a detailed exposition to the theory, III, c. 3 and V, c. 2, s. 1.

113 Cf. Thomasius, Instit. iur. div. I, c. 1, §§ 114sqq. and Fund. I, c. 5, § 115sqq., where a clear distinction is first drawn [before he comes to the particular question of liberty of conscience] (1) between jus conatum and jus acquisitum, and (2) between the 'subjective' side of any body of law [law or 'Right' as expressed in the rights of 'Subjects' or persons] and its objective side [law or 'right' as expressed externally in a concrete body of rules]. See also J. H. Boehmer, P. spec. I, c. 5 and III, cc. 1-2, and Gundling, c. 1, §§ 51-62.

114 Locke, II, c. 11; cf. also Sidney, I, ss. 10 and 11 and II, ss. 4 and 20. The same view appears in the French physiocrats

115 The main object of Wolff's enquiries into the extent to which the original law of nature is either over-ridden by the contracts which form the State, or still continues to preserve its validity, is simply to attain a basis for dividing the rights and duties of political man into those which are acquired and those which are innate. The conclusion which he attains is that the individual retains the sovereignty he enjoyed in the state of nature, in regard to all actions which the political authority is not warranted by its purpose in regulating, but he also vindicates the inviolability of those 'acquired' rights which are so much bound up with man's being that he cannot be deprived of them. Instit. §§ 68sqq., 980, Jur. nat. I, §§ 26sqq. and VIII, §§ 35 and 47, Pol. §§ 215 and 433.

Natural as opposed to civil rights

Thomasius on liberty of conscience

Wolff on natural rights

116. Cf. e.g. Daries, P. spec. §§ 710-46 (jura naturalia absoluta), Nettelbladt, §§ 143sqq., 193sqq., 1127, 1134-42 (there are obligationes connatae as well as contractas, and jura connata as well as quiesita), Achenwall, I, §§ 63-86, II, §§ 11 and 98-108, Kreittmayr, §§ 32sqq., Scheidemantel, III, pp. 172-343. See also Turgot, art. Fondation, § 6, p. 75 les citoyens ont des droits et des devoirs sacrés pour le corps même de la société. Compare also Blackstone, Comm. I, c. 1, pp. 124sqq. [where Blackstone distinguishes 'absolute' rights from those which are 'social and relative']

Vogue of theory of natural rights

Montesquieu, it is true, assigns to the State the object of realising as far as possible the spiritual and economic liberty of the individual (cf. e.g. XII, cc. 1-18, XIII, cc. 12 and 14, XX, c. 8, XXIII, cc. 9-13), but in attacking slavery he merely uses the idea of the inalienability of liberty (XV, cc. 1-18) [In other words, he speaks of liberty as achieved by the State, but at the same time regards it as independent of the State.]

Justi also (§ 18) pronounces that government to be the best which limits 'natural liberty' as little as possible and yet succeeds in achieving the purpose of the State

117. This is especially true of Sieyès, whose Reconnaissance et exposition des droits de l'homme et citoyen, of July 1789 (I, pp. 427sqq.), forms the basis of the public Declaration of the Rights of Man (I, pp. 413sqq.). Along with freedom, which the citizens bring with them as their inalienable right into the social state (II, pp. 35sqq.), he makes property, 'that God of all legislation' (II, p. 35), inviolable by the State as also II, pp. 374sqq.* In the present context, in which we are only concerned with the theoretical [and not with the historical] development, we need not reckon with the fact, on which Jellinek has remarked, that the American 'bills of rights' [e.g. the Virginia Bill of Rights, and the Pennsylvania 'Declaration of the Rights of the Inhabitants of the Commonwealth or State', of June and September, 1776] were anterior to the French Revolution of 1789 as constitutional assertions of the fundamental rights of individuals.

Droits de l'homme in 1789

In Kant also the innate and inalienable rights of the individual—in the three senses of the liberty of man, the equality of subjects and the independence of the citizen—form the limits and the canon of all political life. Works, VI, pp. 322sqq. and 416sqq. and VII, pp. 348sqq., 147sqq. A similar view is to be found in A. L. von Schrözer, pp. 51sqq. Hoffbauer goes to the furthest length. He begins by developing a system of the absolute (or original), and the conditional (or acquired) rights, which belong to all rational existence (pp. 64sqq.), he then proceeds to depict the absolute or original rights of man (pp. 111sqq.), only after that does he arrive at man's conditional or acquired rights (pp. 120sqq.). But even now he has first to discuss the 'universal', and then the 'particular', species of such rights, and afterwards, under the latter head, to treat of an 'extra-social' form, before he finally arrives at the 'social' form of the 'particular' species of 'conditional' rights [cf. n. 19 supra for this process of subdivision in excelsis].

Möser attacks the conception of the rights of man (Misc. Writings, I, pp. 306, 313, 335) but he definitely recognises in an earlier work (Patriot. Phantas., III, no. 62) the existence of free rights of the individual which are not forfeited in the social state.

* Reference may also be made to T. Paine's Rights of Man, Part I (of January, 1791).

118. In this connection [i.e. as regards the passing of individualism into a system of social absolutism, and vice versa] the variations of opinion which Fichte could achieve without abandoning his theoretical basis are particularly significant. In 1793 he regards the purpose of the State as consisting only in 'the cultivation of liberty' (Works, vi, p. 101), in 1796, in speaking of 'the purpose of Right or law', he is already willing to think of an economic transformation of the State in conformity with the idea of Right, and in 1800 (iii, pp. 387sqq.) he even derives his socialistic State, directed to the general welfare, from this idea [Gierke here is referring to Fichte's Der geschlossene Handelstaat, on which see W. Wallace, Lectures and Essays, pp. 427sqq.]. By 1804 he is expanding the purpose of the State into 'the purpose of the human race', which leads him to interpret it as being the promotion of general culture (vii, pp. 144sqq.), and in 1807 he depicts the ideal of an educational State (vii, pp. 428sqq.). Later still, he attempts to reconcile this later purpose of education and moral development with the earlier purpose of 'the cultivation of liberty' (Works, iv, pp. 367sqq., Posthumous Works, II, pp. 539-42).

Corresponding to the variations in his view of the State's function are the changes in his conception of the relation of the individual to society. At first he emphasises the inalienable rights of man which cannot be diminished by any form of contract (Works, vi, pp. 159-61). In his Naturechts (1796-7) he argues vigorously, in opposition to Rousseau, that the individual is only merged into the organised whole in one part of his being and nature, but otherwise remains 'a completely free person, who is not woven into the whole of the body politic' (Works, iii, pp. 204-6), and even in Der geschlossene Handelstaat of 1800 he still maintains this point of view (iii, pp. 387sqq.). In his Grundzüge des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters (1804-5) he entirely alters his view: the individual is now completely merged in the perfect State which ought to be the goal of endeavour. He has nothing per se he has everything in virtue of being a member of the State, he is entirely the instrument of the State, and he is only sovereign 'in regard to his necessary purpose as a member of the race' [i.e. he is only sovereign in so far as he is part of a general humanity which is itself sovereign in determining the purposes of its life], cf. vii, pp. 147sqq., 153, 157sqq., 210. He takes the same line in the Reden an die deutsche Nation (1807-8), but later still he adopts more of a via media, emphasising the 'moral liberty of the will' which is still left to the 'instrument' of which he had previously spoken (ii, pp. 537sqq.).

119. [Not only is individualism no bulwark against socialism and communism] on the contrary, it rather appears as if the elevation of the individual into the terminus a quo and the terminus ad quem of social institutions were an inseparable element of socialistic and communistic systems.

120. Leibniz approaches nearest to this way of thinking, in the introduction to his Cod. iur. gent. dipl. I, §§ 11-13. There are also statements in Ferguson (1, cc. 7-10) which make the social aim consist, not in the greatest possible amount of pleasure, but in the greatest possible amount of spiritual activity, and therefore in the free development of the powers both of the national community and of individuals (cf. also v, c. 3). Scheidemantel too rises to the view (1, pp. 75sqq.) that there are certain natural basic rules for the attainment of the aim of the State, of which the greatest is that the well-being of the whole and the private well-being of the parts are to be simultaneously and jointly pursued by every individual and every society, but that, where there is any clash, the well-being of the whole must be preferred

121. Horn accordingly makes a definite attack on theories of the original sovereignty of the people (n. c. 1, § 18), of the existence of a 'real majesty' [as distinct from 'personal'] (n. c. 10, §§ 11-15), and of the possibility of a subjectum commune of majesty (n. c. 11, § 1). But he equally impugns the possibility of the popular community possessing any right whatsoever as against the Ruler (n. c. 5, § 1).

122. Horn attempts to prove (iii. c. un. § 2) that it is impossible for plures conjunctum to be the 'Subject' of majesty. When rule is ascribed to all ut universi in a democracy, it is ipso facto also attributed at the same time to all ut singuli, and the result is that, since imperium et obsequium non inhabitant unam personam, the existence of any 'Subject' at all is really denied. If, on the other hand, it be admitted that singuli are simply subdit, it follows that no other quality than that of being a body of subdit can be predicated of singuli conjunctum, i.e. of all whom they are regarded as united in a universitas.* Moreover [apart from the logical difficulty] there is a further difficulty, which is involved in the recognition of the majority-principle. That recognition means either that universi are deposed [in favour of a mere majority] or that the rulers are, in part [i.e. as regards the minority], turned into being the ruled, but in any case a sovereign which changes with each vote would be a curious sort of sovereign. If we now turn from democracy to aristocracy, we find once more that there is no 'Subject' or owner of majesty. Here again, just as in democracy, a distinction has to be made between universi and singuli, though the two things thus distinguished are really one and indistinguishable. For if singuli have nothing, universi equally have nothing, and if universi have authority, singuli equally have a part of that authority, and the result [on the latter supposition] is that each member of the ruling class will have a particula majestatis which, like the whole of which it is a part, will be summa, and thus a number of summa imperia will arise. Horn then argues, in § 3, that it is no less impossible for omnes or plures to possess 'majesty' severally (divisum) than it is for them to possess it jointly (conjunctum).

123. Cf. n. c. un., and supra, n. 96 to this section

124. Pufendorf (J. n. et g. VII, c. 5, § 5) delivers a vigorous attack on the 'sophistical' arguments of Horn, objecting to him that, at any rate in moralibus, the whole can possess attributes which no part possesses, and arguing accordingly that, in corporibus moralibus compositis, aliquid tribus potest universus quod neque omnibus (i.e. singulis divisim summis) neque uni alicui ex ipsis singulis queat tribui, adeoque universitas revera est persona moralis a singulis distincta, cui pecularis voluntas, actiones et iura tribui queant, quae in singulis non cadunt. Compare also Schmier (i. c. 3, nos. 62-72), who seeks to prove, in opposition to Horn, both the philosophical and the legal justification of the distinction between a totum compositum and its partes separatae acceptae.

125. Spinoza agrees entirely with Hobbes in thinking that a social body controlled by a single mind (ut omnium mentes et corpora unam quasi mentem uniusquisque corpus component) can come into existence through the vesting of all power in the Ruler, in virtue of a transference of their power by all individuals, so that the Ruler, qua Civitas, henceforth represents the will of every individual. Civitatis voluntas pro omnium voluntate habenda est id quod

Horn's attack on any form of plural sovereignty

Critics of Horn's views

The Ruler as representing the Group

* Cf. the argument of Hobbes, supra n. 155 to § 14.

Civitas justum et bonum esse decernit, tanquam ab unoquoque decreatum esse censendum est of Eth. iv, prop. 18 schol., Tract. pol. c. 2, § 15, c. 3, §§ 1-5, c. 4, §§ 1-2

Mevius (Prodromus, v, §§ 23-6) similarly holds that the uno, by virtue of which the State is una velut persona (cui una mens, unus sensus, una voluntas, et anima inter multas velut una atque eadem), is based on the submission of all wills to that of the Ruler, whence it follows that imperantes totam multitudinem repraesentant et ejus vice sunt—their action counting as the action of the 'whole community and of all severally', and the 'will and judgment of the Rulers being the will and judgment of the whole society or State'. See also Houtuy-nus, Pol. gen. §§ 99, no. 14, Microclius, i, c. 10, §§ 14-17, Bossuet, i, a. 3, prop. 1-6, vi, a. 1, prop. 2-3

126 Cf Tract. theol.-pol. c. 16 (coetus universus hominum, qui collegialiter summum jus ad omnia, quae potest, habet), Tract. pol. cc. 3, 6 (ut jus, quod unusquisque ex natura habet, collective haberent), Eth. iv, prop. 18 schol.

127 E.g. the one conclusion that emerges in Bossuet (v, a. 1) is nothing more than the dictum, so often quoted since, that the monarch is l'État même

128 Huber, De jure civ. i, 3, c. 4, §§ 8-83, ii, 3, c. 1, § 35 see also, on the validity of the majority-principle, which is referred to an original act of agreement, i, 2, c. 3, §§ 27sqq., ii, 3, c. 1, §§ 21-2 and c. 2, §§ 3-4

129 Ibid. i, 3, c. 2, § 14, c. 6, § 26, i, 9, c. 5, §§ 51 and 65-72, ii, 3, c. 6, § 2

130 Ibid. ii, 3, c. 6, §§ 1-10

131 Cf Elem. i, def. 4, § 13, J. n. et g. 1, c. 1, § 13 persona moralis composita constitutus, quando plura individua humana ita inter se uniuersit, ut quae et ipsis unionis volunt aut agant pro una voluntate unaquae actione, non pro pluribus censeantur Therefore, he argues, not only is a pactum unionis necessary in order to produce, first of all, the State (J. n. et g. vii, c. 2, § 6), a similar pactum singulorum cum singulis, to the effect that certain things shall be managed jointly and in the interest of una persona moralis, is also indispensable for families, corporations and local groups (Elem. ii, d. 12, § 26) In another passage, where he distinguishes between corpora naturalia, artificialia and moralia, Pufendorf repeats his view that a corpus morale, which remains identical in spite of all the changes of its parts, may be produced by a simple coniunctio hominum (J. n. et g. viii, c. 12, § 7) [In other words, a moral body may already exist in virtue of coniunctio, before any further step has been taken, such as the appointment of a representative organ to act on its behalf.]

132 Cf Elem. i, d. 4, § 3, J. n. et g. 1, c. 1, § 13 Idque tunc fieri intelligitur, quando singuli voluntatem suam voluntati unius hominis aut concilii ita subiiciunt, ut pro omnium voluntate et actione velint agnoscere et ab aliis haberi, quacquid iste decreverit aut gesserit circa illa, quae ad unionis ejus naturam ut talem spectant et fini ejusdem congruent, unde est, quod cum alias, ubi plures quid voluerint aut egerint, tot voluntates et actiones extare intelliguntur, quot numero personae physicae seu individua humana ibi numerantur, in personam tamen compositam coalitus una voluntas tribuatur, et quae ab ipsis ut talibus proficiuntur actio, una censeatur, ut plura individua physica ad eandem concurrent He adds that under these conditions [i.e. where there is a moral body acting corporately through a representative] corporate property comes into existence, which does not belong to singuli, and other similar developments follow. See also J. n. et g. vii, c. 2, § 5, De off. hom. et civ. ii, c. 6, §§ 5-6 unius multorum hominum voluntates nulla alia ratione possunt, quam si unusquisque suam voluntatem voluntat: unius hominis aut unus concilii subiicit, ita ut deinceps pro voluntate omnium et singulorum sit habendum, quicquid de rebus ad securitatem communem necessarius ille voluerit Pufendorf argues, on this basis,

Pufendorf
on corpora moralia
as created by consent

Pufendorf
on the conditions of real Group-
personality

that a Group-person never arises from a simple contract of union, it must always be called into being by a number of contracts (necessarium est, ut voluntates viresque suas univerint interventibus pactis), which find their culmination in the contract of subjection, cf. J. n. et g. vii, c. 2, §6. It follows that a Systema Civitatum [i.e. a confederation], being a nuda conventio, and not having erected any imperium, is not a 'person' [since there is no man, or body of men, with authority to represent it], and cannot act by majority-decision cf. J. n. et g. vii, c. 5, §20

[In brief, the argument is that while simple coniunctio can produce a 'moral body' (see the end of the preceding note), and while such coniunctio may thus be the first step in constituting a 'moral person', there is something more needed before a real 'moral person' can emerge. That something more is the creation of a representative organ, and submission thereto, for only in the 'person' of the representative organ can the 'person' of the corpus morale really exist and function.]

188 The doctrine of entia moralia already occurs, in essence, in Elem. 1, d. 1 sqq. [of the year 1660], but it is developed further in J. n. et g. 1, cc. 1-2 [of the year 1672]

184 J. n. et g. 1, c. 1, §3 They are mere modi, which do not come into existence, like entia physica, through 'creation', but through 'imposition' i.e. they are 'superadded' to something already in existence. They have no power of producing physical changes, and the only effect they produce is on the mind, by making men understand better the nature of their actions (§4). Just as they only come into existence by 'imposition', so they may be changed, or even abolished, by some alteration of such 'imposition' (whether by God or men), but the sort of change to which they are thus subject is one by which ipsa personarum aut rerum substantia physica is not affected (§23).

185 Ibid §§5-6 Pufendorf prefers the twofold classification of 'moral entities' under these categories [of substance and attribute] to the single classification which we should have to adopt if we confined ourselves to the idea that all entia moralia, being modi, are attributes of homines, actiones or res

186. Pufendorf begins by arguing that in the moral world status, as the basis of the existence of 'moral persons', corresponds to what spatium is in the physical world as the basis of the existence of physical persons in place and time * He admits some difference spatium can continue to exist after the disappearance of all natural objects, but status is inconceivable after the disappearance of the persons who exist in that medium (loc. cit. §§6-10)

Having drawn this analogy [between the basis of existence of moral and that of physical persons], Pufendorf proceeds to interpret 'moral persons' themselves in the light of the analogy of physical substances (§§ 12-15) [But while he thus interprets persons as being moral in a way analogous to that in which substances are physical], he thinks it unnecessary ever to interpret objects (res) as being 'moral' in this sort of way, since the attributes of objects (e.g. that they are 'sacred') can be referred on a deeper analysis to an obligatio hominum (§16) † Other entia moralia [i.e. moral entities other than

Pufendorf's
theory of entia moralia

Some are substances some only attributes Moral persons like substances

* Pufendorf's spatium is 'time-space' it is both temporal and spatial extent

† We need not regard a thing, such as a sanctuary, as being an ens morale, on the ground that it has the attribute of being sacred, and that there must be an ens as the substance which carries that attribute. Really, the attribute of being sacred can be reduced, if we turn from the thing to the men behind the thing, to an obligation of men to regard the thing as sacred personae] are not ad analogiam substantiarum concepta they are simply modi, or attributes, of a purely 'formal' character (§17) They exist, that is to say, either as 'qualities' (e.g. a 'title', or a 'power', or a 'right', or an 'obligation', are all qualities, §§18-21), or as 'quantities' (e.g. 'price', or 'credit', or the value of a business, are all quantities, §22)

Moral persons simple or compound

187. Loc. cit §12: Entra moralia, quas ad analogiam substantiarum concipiuntur, dicuntur personae morales, quae sunt homines singuli aut per vinculum morale in unum systema connecti, considerati cum statu suo aut munere, in quo in vita communi versantur. Sunt autem personae morales vel simplices vel compositae.

Simple moral persons

188. Loc. cit §12 The persona moralis simplex is therefore either publica (whether such 'person' be principalis, or minus principalis, or repraesentativa), or privata (according to profession, civic status, family standing, descent, sex and age) The ens morale can never be a qualitas physica if a plebeian becomes a noble, or vice versa, no physical change is involved, and the Catholic doctrine of an 'indehleble moral character' is therefore absurd (§23) [See n. 134 supra, on the 'imposition', and the consequent possibility of removal, of the modus—the attribute or character—which constitutes 'moral being'. It follows, on this argument, that 'imposition' makes the 'character', or ens morale, of a priest, and what has been 'imposed' can be removed. Holy orders, therefore, are not 'an indehleble moral character', to argue in that sense is to treat such orders as a 'physical quality' which cannot be altered.]

189. Loc. cit §14 (the individual may 'bear' a number of 'persons' because he has a number of 'positions' (status) which do not conflict)

190. Loc. cit §13 cf. supra, n. 132

191. Loc. cit §15 here we see that the impositio of an ens morale is not independent of every quality of the object Caligula could make a fool into a senator, but not his horse

Pufendorf also rejects the personification of inanimate objects which Hobbes achieves in c. 16 of the Leviathan [e.g. of a bridge on which there is a right of charging tolls] as an unnecessary fiction—cum simplicissime dicatur, a civitate certis hominibus iunctuam curam colligendi redditus isti rebus servandis destinatos, et quae eo nomine oruntur actiones persequendi aut excipiendi

192. Cf. Elem. 1, d. 4, §3, J n et g 1, c. 1, §13, vii, c. 2, §6 It follows that personae morales compositae are not able seiphas qua tales obligare, any more than single persons are able to do so Their decisions only bind membra societatis qua singula, nequamquam autem societatem ipsam qua tales The contract for the foundation [of the society, as a 'compound moral person'] is not a case to the contrary the society does not 'oblige itself' in any way even by that act, all that happens is that 'the members severally, as such, bind one another mutually, to the effect that they are willing to coalesce in a single body' If an individual afterwards gives a vote, he too does not oblige himself directly thereby, it is only indirectly that he does so—i.e. in so far as he helps [by that vote] to form the will which under the pactum fundamentale is binding upon him. Cf. Elem. 1, d. 12, §17

193. Pufendorf himself often uses the expression persona physica instead of persona moralis simplex cf. J n et g 1, c. 1, §13, vii, c. 2, §6 and c. 5, §8

194. Pufendorf expressly urges that 'naturally' a confusio omnium voluntatum in unam is impossible, and that a common will can only arise [by something more than a natural process, i.e.] by a moralis translatio voluntatum, whereby illud quasque velle censetur, quod in alium contulit, [a]equo ac si ipse vellet. In the same way the union of the powers of individuals [as distinct from their wills] does not come to pass naturally, but as a result of promises of obedience and the giving of guarantees for the fulfilment of those promises of J. n. et g. vn., c. 2, §5 and De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, §§5–6, and see also, as regards the impossibility of uno naturalis and the nature of uno moralis, Otto's commentary on the latter passage. Pufendorf accordingly goes so far as to commend the comparison drawn by Hobbes between the State and an 'artificial man', J. n. et g. loc. cit. §13 and De off. hom. et civ. loc. cit. §10.

Nature of compound moral persons

Such persons not natural, but created by agreement

145 Elem. I, d. 12, §27, J. n. et g. vn., c. 2, §§15–19 and c. 5, §6, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, §12. Such an agreement [establishing the validity of majority-decisions] is always to be presumed, in Pufendorf's view, because there is no better way than majority-decision of arriving at a united expression of will by an assembly. He admits that any individual, on entering a society, may reserve for himself a right of giving or withholding his assent [to a majority-decision] on any issue, but he argues that, even in that event, the mere pertinacia of such an individual does not affect the decision of the assembly adversely, for though the decision will not be binding upon him ex suo consensu, it will still be binding ex generali lege ut ceteris sese commodum praebeat et ut pars se conformet ad bonum totius.

146 J. n. et g. vn., c. 2, §§13–14, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, §§10–11. The commentators—Titius, Otto, Trauer and Hertnus—expressly censure Pufendorf for taking over from Hobbes, in these passages, the identification of the Imperans with the Civitas of also Titius, Obser. 557.

147 Pufendorf accordingly describes the sovereign Concilium in a republic as a persona moralis composite or conjuncta. Elem. I, d. 12, §27, J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, §15, c. 5, §5, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 8, §4.

148. Hert, for example, emphasises the fact that what is 'physically' impossible is sometimes 'morally' possible, and what is monstrous in physicus may be unexceptionable in moralibus e.g. on a consideratio physica a plurality of men cannot be one, nor one man a plurality, but on a consideratio moralis a number of men may be taken together as a single person, or one man may be taken to be several persons. In the realm of nature a single head with a number of bodies, or a single body with a number of heads, is a monstrum, but this is by no means true of moral bodies. Cf Annot. ad Pufend. J. n. et g. I, c. 1, §3 n. 4 and Opusc. I, 3, pp. 27sqq and II, 3, pp. 41sqq.

149 Thomasius defines a persona as homo consideratus cum suo statu. He distinguishes between the persona simplex, sc. unicum individuum humanum, and the persona composita ex pluribus individuis certo statu unitis (Instit. Jur. Div. I, c. 1, §§86–7), and he defines the State as a persona moralis composita (ibid. III, c. 6, §§62–3). Titius regards jurisprudence as almost exclusively concerned with personae morales, which are either singulares or compositae (Obser. 94, Jus priv. Rom.-Germ. VIII, c. 2). Cf also Ickstatt (Opusc. II, op. 1, c. 1, §§14–15), who regards persona moralis simplex and persona moralis composita as distinct, exactly like Pufendorf.

150 Hert, Opusc. I, 1, pp. 286 and 288, II, 3, pp. 41 and 55, Gundling, Jus nat. c. 35, §34, c. 37, §§3–10, and Exerc. 16, §5 (personae mysticae vulgo audiunt, ac morales compositae dicuntur), Schmier, I, c. 3, nos. 62–72, and also Beckmann, c. 12, §7.

151 Nettelbladt (Syst. nat. §83) can still remark incidentally that 'physical persons' are also called 'single' (singulares), and 'moral persons' also go by the name of 'composite' or 'mystical', but he himself only uses the expression 'moral persons'. Cf also Scheidemantel, III, p. 244.

152 Cf e.g. J. H. Boehmer, P. spec. 1, c. 2, §1, c. 3, §1 n. 9, Heineccius, Elem. II, §20, Achenwall, Proleg. §§92-3, II, §§3 and 15, Hoffbauer, pp. 190, 244, 292, 310.

Leibniz adopts the terms persona naturalis and persona civilis in his terminology, but he also uses the adjectives moralis or ficta as synonymous with civilis. Nova meth. II, §16, Introd. to the Cod. iur. gent. I, §22; Caesar-Fürst c. 11, Spec. demonstr. pol. pr. 1 and 57.

153. In the theory of Wolff (Instit. §96) man is a persona moralis or sittliche Person in so far as he is regarded as the 'Subject' or owner of rights or obligations, and is thus in a moralis status or sittliche Zustand, cf. also §§850, 963, 1030.

Daries (Praecogn. §§9, 24) holds that by 'person in the juridical sense', or 'moral person', we mean man 'in so far as he has a certain moral status'—ex quo manifestum est a personalitate ut ita dicam physica ad personalitatem moralem non valere consequentiam.

154. Thus Treuer, in a note to Pufendorf's De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 6, §5, holds that a 'union of wills' is possible by means of mere societas et foedera, without imperium—though a union by means of imperium is better.

Thomasius interprets the personality of the State in exactly the same way as Pufendorf (Instit. iur. div. III, c. 6, §§27, 31, 62-4, 157, Fund. III, c. 6, §7), but after including the State in the category of societas mixtae, which blend the principle of Fellowship with that of Rulership, he proceeds to add to these 'mixed societies' two other forms of society—the societas inaequalis of God and man, which rests on the pure principle of Rulership, and the societas aequalis, which rests on the pure principle of Fellowship (Instit. iur. div. I, c. 1, §§91-113, III, c. 1, §§57-74).

Titus ascribes the unity of the personality of the State entirely to the representation of all its members by the Ruler, who has thus a double personality, while the subject only possesses a single personality (Spec. iur. publ. I, c. 1, §§43sqq., VII, c. 7, §§19sqq.), but in dealing with the universitas, which he relegates altogether to the sphere of private law, he assumes the existence of a purely Collective persona moralis composita (Observ. 94, Jus priv. Rom.-Germ. VIII, c. 2).

155. De modo const. s. 1, §§2-3 (Opusc. I, 1, pp. 286-8), cf. also Elem. I, 8, 3.

156. Cf. Opusc. I, 1, p. 288 (*Quod enim de universitate dicitur, eam nec animam nec intellectum habere, non consenire nec dolo facere, hinc alienum est, quoniam universitas pars est tantum civitatis et quicquid juris spiritus habet, accepti concessu vel expresso vel tacito compotum summae potestatis, * alique haec tenus persona est mystica, sive ex praescripto juris personae vicem sustinet; neque dubium est, quin hoc aspectu contrahere et delinquere possit*) Hert accordingly ascribes an absolute representative authority to the Rector Civitatis [the Head of the State], but he will only allow to the Rector Universitatis [the Head of a corporation] such representative authority as comes within the limits of the powers granted to him by the sovereign (note 3 to Pufend. J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, §§22, and Opusc. II, 3, p. 55).

157. Opusc. I, 3, pp. 27-44

158. Ibid. II, 3, pp. 41-7

159. In his treatment of the first set of cases [those in which one man sustains several persons], Hert begins by considering the possibility of the same

* 'By the concession of those who are in control (compones sunt) of the supreme power.'

Wolff also follows Pufendorf in part

Collective and representative unity

Hert's view that group-unity involves a Representative individual being reckoned, upon a consideratio moralis, as being several different persons in his different capacities (sect 1, §§1-2). He proceeds to lay down some jejune general rules for such contingencies (sect 1, §§3-7). He then discusses, as cases which come under these rules, (1) the union [in one man] of various rights of status which have their basis in the Family and the State (sect 2), (2) the different capacities enjoyed simultaneously by the Emperor, and by the Estates, in the German Empire (sect 4), and (3) the conjunction of a number of different powers [in the same individual] in the domain of private law (sect 4).

His theory of one man with many 'persons'

160 In treating the second set of cases [those in which several men sustain one person], Hert begins by attempting to prove the possibility of several men uniting to form a single persona moralis. There are three sorts of unum—the unum per se, the unum per accidens and the unum per aggregationem—according as it is a 'natural', an 'artificial', or a 'moral' bond which unites the parts in question. A 'moral body' is brought into being by a 'moral bond', quo per institutum humanum diversa individua ita colliguntur, ut unum esse intelligantur (Proleg §§1-2). He proceeds to suggest general rules for collective persons [of this moral order]. Either a societas aequalis or a societas rectiora may be the basis (§3); the Group-person may come to possess capacities and rights (e.g. of legislation, or the power of life and death) which belong to none of the single persons so grouped (§4), the associates continue to remain certo aspectu singuli (§5), the rights and duties of the collective person non sunt singulorum nisi per consequentiam (§6).

Hert then distinguishes two 'sources' of this 'unity of persons' [in a moral body]. The one is 'Lex fingit', the other is 'Conventio hominum efficit'. Under the first head—that of the feigned unity of persons (sect. 1)—he treats of paterfamilias et filius (§§1-7), of defunctus et haeres (§§8-16), of defunctus et haereditas jacens (§17), of jus repraesentationis (§18) and of Christus et Ecclesia (§19). Under the second head—that of contractual unity of persons (sect 11)—he deals with matrimonium (§§1-3), civitas (§§4-8), universitas (§§9-11), correspondendi et credendi (§§12-15), and vasallus feudum individuum habentes with feoffies (§16).

161. Jus nat c 3, §52 (in imperio civili imperantes soli mens civitatis sunt, et si subjects non carent mente, sed sapienti ipsimet, immo aliquando imperantibus sapientiores sunt), c 35, §30 (magistratus voluntas est voluntas universorum et singulorum), c 37, §§2-3 and Disc c 34. The persona moralis seu mystica only appears, therefore, in Gundling's theory of the State when he is speaking of a republic. Jus nat. c 35, §34, c 37, §§3-10

162. Dissert de universitate delinquentis, §§1-5. A universitas is only a 'multitude' united by 'consent'; the object of such consent is in unum coalescere, ut idem intelligere et velle censeantur from consent directed to that object resultat unitas, cuius ratione personae mysticae vulgo audiunt, ac morales compostaeque dicuntur.

163. Loc. cit §§6-8. A fictio juris is in no way necessary to explain this Group-person. We can see for ourselves how a unity like that of an individual man comes into existence through the union of the wills of a number of men. It does not matter if it is only with the intellect, and not by sense-perception, that we realise the union of the Many in the One, and the distinction of the One from the Many. If it did matter [i.e. if sense-perception were a necessity], all res incorpores would be imaginary, and only what we see or hear or smell or feel or taste would be real, and that is absurd, for since there is

His theory of several men with one 'person'

Gundling holds that the State needs a representative

He makes a corporation only a collective unit

His rejection of the theory of fiction

no demonstratio without mentis abstractio, and no truth without demonstration, we should be driven to saying that truth itself is untrue. Nor is a fictio necessary to explain the assumption of a consensus universitatis, for although a consensus omnium is not easy to attain, it none the less follows from the nature of a universitas (since it exists, but cannot continue to exist without motion, and must therefore necessarily choose modus volendi aut nolendi possibilis in order that it may set itself in motion) that 'the will of the major part should count as the will of the whole person constituted by a number of men'

Gundling, however, admits that universitates certo sensu artificiales sunt qua pactis coagumentantur quibus Hobbesius non male artificis nomen tribuit. They are not created by nature, but by reflection and will

*His insistence
on the collective principle*

164 We must note, it is true, Gundling's contention (loc. cit §§ 13-48) that a universitas may even be guilty of delict and suffer penalties accordingly. But it is also to be noted, first that such delict can only be committed (in his view) by the common action of all, and not by a majority or by the body of managers, and secondly that a universitas may also commit murder or similar crimes, while, as for the penalties of delict, it is only the guilty persons (either taken together or severally) who are affected by them, and the abolition of the corporation as such is not regarded as a possible penalty

165 This distinction appears in Kestner, c 7, § 3 (cf also Hert, supra p 122) and in Schmier, I, c 3, II, c 3, s. 1, §§ 1-3, V, c. 1, nos 87sqq and c 2, nos 52sqq

166. According to J H Boehmer, a societas means a complexus plurorum personarum uniarum inter se ad certum finem: it constitutes a 'moral body', and the spiritus of that body is a union of the wills of all, in one will, such that conjunctionem consideratis unam in moralibus reppresentent personam. In an 'equal society', thus 'union of wills' is based upon 'simple obligation', but just for that reason it remains imperfect. In an 'unequal society'—though the ground or basis is still an 'association of equals'—the factors of imperium and subjectio are superimposed, by the 'submission of all wills to the single will of one man or of a whole council', with the result that voluntas omnium in voluntate hugis ita concentratur, ut quod imperans summus in negotiis ad finem civitatis spectantibus vult, omnes velia moraliter censeantur. (Cf Ius publ univ P gen c 2, § 4 n 5, P spec 1, c 2, §§ 1-18, c 3, § 1 n 6, §§ 15-21)

167 Cf Heiniccius, Elem II, §§ 13, 115, Mullerus, I, c 1, Wolff, Insti §§ 39, Nettelbladt, Syst nat §§ 354-61, Achenwall, II, §§ 22-39, Daries, Præcogn. §§ 17-23, P spec 550sqq, Hoffbauer, pp 194, 199sqq, 205sqq

The State as an unequal society

168 This view explains why the State, as a societas perfectissima, was regarded as beginning its existence with the substitution of an 'unequal society' for the original 'equal society' (which is sharply distinguished from 'democracy' (Boehmer, I, c 2, §§ 6-12), and occasionally even described as 'anarchy' (Daries, §§ 651sqq)), when the imperfections of this equal society began to make themselves felt. It was often urged, too, in the strength of this view, that unity was more perfect in a monarchy than in a republic, where the Ruler in his nature reflected and represented an 'equal society'

169 The family system of government was generally the only 'unequal society' which was recognised, other than the State, and all corporations, including the Church, were interpreted as being 'equal societies', cf § 18, infra [on the natural-law theory of corporations].

*Corporations
as equal societies*

170 This is the reason why we often find the conception of the persona moralis civitatis treated as entirely irrelevant in regard to monarchy, and only

*Difference of monarchy
and republic*

applied to republics of Gundling, in n. 161 supra. Ickstatt expressly says that in a monarchy, where the king represents the whole State and all its members, totus Reipublicae intellectus atque voluntas in intellectum et voluntatem personae moralis simplicis resoluntur; whereas 'Polyarchy', or the government of Many, involves a persona moralis composita (Opusc. II, op. 1, c. 1, §§ 14-16 and 66).

171 Thus J. H. Boehmer applies the conception of the persona moralis of the State only in the sphere of international law (P. gen. c. 2, §§ 3-7, P. spec. I, c. 3, § 22).

172 We have already noticed, in n. 160 above, the lengths to which Hert was prepared to go in this direction.

173 Like Pufendorf and Hert (supra, n. 139 and nn. 157-60), Nettelbladt, in his Syst. nat. §§ 82 and 1194 and Syst. pol. § 16, and C. von Schlozer, in the De jure suffragi, § 11, both draw this parallel.

174 Heineccius allows that every 'society', including the State, is only the result of consensus duorum pluriusque in eundem finem eademque media, quae ad finem illum obtinendum sunt necessaria, but he also holds that—in view of the fact that 'one will and one mind' arise, either through conspiratio in unum or through submissio omnium voluntatum to the will of a Ruler—omnis societas est una persona moralis, and possesses, as such, like duties, rights, and even 'affections' (e.g. life, sickness and death) with the individual. Accordingly, he argues, every society confronts not only other societies and individuals, but also its own socii, as a distinct 'Subject' or owner of rights (Elem. II, §§ 13-25, 115).

175 Wolff's general theory of societies (Instit. §§ 836-53) is based throughout on the idea of a contract directed to the attainment of common ends by common means, and it is from this contract that he derives the whole system of law, and of rights and duties, which regulates the internal life of corporations—including the authority which 'all taken together' [allen insgesamt] exercise over 'individuals'. It is only in its external relations, he holds, that 'each society, because its members act with united forces, appears as a single person', and it is particularly in this sphere (of their external relations to one another) that 'a number of different societies are to be viewed as if they were so many free individual persons'. Wolff thus finds no difficulty in describing a 'moral person' as the owner in any case of joint property where a number of persons are each deemed to have a share, since in such a case that 'number of persons, taken together, are treated as a single person, and what is true of an individual owner is true of them when taken together' (§ 196). [Not only does he thus recognise the simple 'moral person' he also recognises compound 'moral persons'.] He treats the Family as being a societas composita, because the members of which it is composed are not mere 'physical individuals', as they are in a 'simple society', but are 'whole societies which are treated as single moral persons', i.e. the society of husband and wife, the society of father and child, and the society of master and servant (§ 977).

On the other hand [and while he thus recognises a variety of moral persons], Wolff regards even the moral personality of the State itself as nothing more than 'the whole community', in the sense of the sum total of all individuals, including the Ruler (§ 1030), and the result is, that while he thinks that international law can be based on the character of States as 'free persons living in a natural state' (§§ 977 and 1088), he never mentions the State as a person in dealing with its system of [internal] public law.

Heineccius
on the unity of a society

Wolff's theory of Groups

Daries' scheme of associations

176 Daries begins by constructing a comprehensive scheme of jus sociale in genere on the basis of a conception of societas which makes it a status per quem personae in personam competit jus perfectum atque affirmativum—or, in other words, a condition which involves a nexus of legal relations by which individuals are either connected with one another by equal rights and duties, or are set over against one another as rulers and ruled (§§ 517–61) On this basis he proceeds to interpret all societies, up to and including 'civil society' or the State (§§ 562sqq.) In dealing with the State, he distinguishes the two sorts of nexus between its members—the nexus between the imperans and his subjects, and that of the subjects with one another (§§ 661)—but he makes the imperans the one and only 'Subject' of [political] rights (§§ 655sqq.) He applies the conception of the 'moral person' only in regard to the external relations of a group [and not in regard to its inward unity] Cf. Præcogn. § 24, plures homines, quibus ad commune aliquid obtinendum concessa sunt jura, in uno eodemque statu moralis sunt etiam unam personam moralem constituent

Nettelbladt's theory of associations

177 Nettelbladt lays the foundation [for his general view of associations] in his theory of jurisprudentia naturalis generalis socialis (as stated in his Syst. nat. §§ 362–414) In expounding this theory he starts from the definition of societas as a coniunctio plurim hominum ad eundem finem conjunctis viribus obtinendum, and then proceeds to develop in advance all the conceptions by the aid of which he afterwards explains the rights and duties of Family, Corporation, Church and State

178 This is especially the case [i.e. Nettelbladt is forced to set the whole over against individuals] in regard to the 'equal society' which possesses potestas, for here authority over the individual socii is ascribed to the societas ipsa, and not, as in an 'unequal society', to an imperans, or, as in societies without potestas, to an extraneus (§§ 335–46 and 355–6) But Nettelbladt hastens to add that societas is to be understood, in such a case, as signifying only omnes socii simul sumpti

179 Cf. Syst. nat. §§ 83–6, 329–30, 335, and Syst. pos. §§ 17 and 865 Nettelbladt does not seek to invoke the idea of a 'fiction' in this connection he prefers to think that tum eorum intellectus, voluntates et vites sunt ut unus intellectus, una voluntas et una vis, siveque ab uno homine non nisi in corporum numero differunt, quae differentia hic non est attendenda (§ 84) He also argues that while the conceptions of birth and death are not applicable to such a person, its origin may be compared to birth and its dissolution to death (§ 85) But he always identifies the 'moral person' with plura individua humana simul sumpta (§ 83), and thus he says of the State, Cives alicius Republika simul sumti persona moralis sunt, quae est ipsa Republika (Syst. nat. § 1122; cf. §§ 1132–3, 1200, 1403sqq.)

Achenwall's theory of associations

180 Cf. Proleg. §§ 92–3 a societas, as a body of men, considerata generaliter, abstrahendo nomine ab us quae hoc vel illud singulare ejus membrorum concernant, spectari negunt nisi tanquam ens unum Since it is a whole of which the parts are men, it has the same natural rights and duties as each of its members, except in so far as the 'very nature of society' constitutes a difference It is therefore a person, though it is called a 'moral' or a 'mystical person', or a 'moral' or a 'mystical body', to distinguish it from the individual, who is a 'single person', and the whole system of the natural rights and duties of individuals is accordingly applicable to it, except in so far as diversa hominum individua et societatis natura makes modifications necessary These modifications are then developed in II, §§ 16–21.

181. Note, in this connection [i.e. as showing the individualistic basis of Achenwall's thought], the account which he gives, in developing his theory of societas in genere (ii, §§ 2-40), of jus sociale universum internum (ibid. §§ 5-13). He always interprets this jus as consisting in the reciprocal rights and duties which belong to individuals as socii—i.e. the rights and duties which spring from their 'social juridical nexus', and are thus to be distinguished from their rights and duties as homines, though if more than two members are concerned [so that it is a case not of A versus B, but of A + B etc versus C], he regards the sum of reciprocal rights and duties as involving a jus sociale universorum in singulis singulique cuiuslibet in universo. On this basis, in an 'equal society' in which the 'right and obligation of all' are the same, there is no internal unity of the group transcending the aggregate of universi, and the voluntas societatis qua unius personae is thus identical with the communis consensus sociorum (ii, §§ 22-31). In an 'unequal society', on the other hand, there is added to the collective unity [i.e. the unity of the aggregate of universi], which also exists in such a society [just as it does an 'equal society'], the further factor of representation of all, to a greater or less degree, by the imperium (ii, §§ 32-9).

Achenwall's individualism

182. Already in his Prolegomena (§ 92) we find Achenwall contending that the conception of the 'moral person' can only be applied to any society respectu non-sociorum, and that it is therefore limited to 'particular societies'. (It cannot apply to the 'universal society of all men',* the existence of which is supposed in Proleg. §§ 82-90 and in i, §§ 43-4.) Accordingly, he only introduces the 'moral person' into his general theory of society when he is dealing with externum jus sociale (ii, §§ 14-22), cf. the dictum in § 15, quum socii conjuncti viribus ad communem finem agant, atque ideo jura ac obligations cum tali fine talique virium usu connexae ipsius communes sint, societas est persona moralis et ab extero tanquam talis spectari debet et potest. While holding thus merely Collective conception, he finds no difficulty in regarding the Family—with its three relationships of husband and wife, parents and children, master and servant—as a 'compound society' whose members are 'mystical' and not 'individual' persons (Proleg. § 94, ii, §§ 78sqq.).

He reduces Groups to collective bodies

183. He says of the State (i, pp. 32sqq.) that from the union of the powers and wills [of individuals] with the commands of its Head 'there arises a Whole, a composite being independent of other societies, which evinces itself in action determined by its own understanding and will, and is therefore capable of having rights and obligations—in other words, a civil society, a people'. In the same way he describes societies other than the State as 'composite persons' (iii, pp. 244sqq.). See also i, pp. 64 and 157sqq., iii, pp. 408sqq., and n. 120 supra.

Scheidemannet has some idea of a Group-person

184. This had been the theory adopted—after Grotius had set the example (see n. 74 to § 14)—by Pufendorf (n. 145 to this section), Thomasius (Inst. iur. div. iii, c. 6, § 64), Gundling (n. 163 to this section), Wolff (Inst. §§ 841-5, where it is argued that by the nature of society all must concur in an agreement that the will of the majority shall be regarded as being the will of all), and Nettelbladt (§ 388, where the majority-principle is said to exist by the very nature of the persona moralis, and by virtue of jura societatis socialia). The fullest argument in favour of this view is to be found in Ickstatt, de jure majorum in conclusis cunctatis communibus formandis (Opusc. ii, op. 1).

The basis of the rights of majorities on the old view

* It cannot apply to the 'universal society,' because that society, as its name indicates, includes all men, and there are therefore no non-socii.

He appeals, in the first place, to the nature of the 'moral person', as a unity possessed of reason and will, which must determine its decisions, in any case of motiva dispartia, by the motiva fortiora—though it is only the external [or quantitative], and not the internal [or qualitative], weight of 'motives' that can settle the issue. He then adduces, as a further argument, the possibility of removing a dead-lock between the different elements of the group-will which is provided by the use of majority-decision, and he also appeals to practical exigencies. But he maintains, notwithstanding (c. 1, §§ 65–68), that the majority-principle is based on pactum [which is somewhat inconsistent with the idea that majority-decision proceeds from the nature of the moral person as a unity].

A peculiar view appears in Daries (§§ 750–62), who, in the spirit of primitive Teutonic law, demands unanimity, though he also assumes an obligatio perfecta of the minority to accede to the decision of the majority.

New demand for unanimity

185 In his treatment of what he calls this 'great controversy', Christian von Schlozer (De jure suffragii, §§ 9–14) cites Grotius, Locke, Pufendorf, Petroni, Coccej and Schlettwein as supporters of the earlier 'communis opinio' which regarded the validity of the majority-principle as derived from Natural Law. He describes the opinion of Wolff (unjustly) as doubtful. The main authorities he cites for his own view (which makes only unanimous decisions valid per se) are Hobbes—whose real doctrine, as stated in n. 74 to this section, is very different—and Rousseau. He also cites Achenwall (who does, as a matter of fact, identify the voluntas societatis qua unius personae with the communis sensus sociorum, n. §§ 24–8, and treats the validity of majority-decisions as a deviation—though a useful deviation—from the general rule of unanimity, secured by a special contract to that effect), and he cites in addition Wedekind, Hopfner, Kohler and Schmalz.

A L von Schlozer on the idea of the People

186 According to A L von Schlozer 'majesty' belongs originally to the people, but since the people is 'the whole of all the children of men', it can do as little with its sovereignty as a child can do with a fief which has fallen to it. Any real sovereignty of the people [as a whole] is altogether inconceivable, because the integrity of such sovereignty has already been destroyed [in any existing form of the so-called sovereignty of the people which we can actually observe] by the exclusion of women, minors and paupers, by the introduction of the majority-principle, and by the erection of a representative assembly cf p 97, § 3 and pp 157–61. [Since the people can thus do nothing with its original sovereignty], that sovereignty is devolved upon a Ruler, who may be either a number of persons or a single person, but if a number of persons be the Ruler, a 'Unum morale must be pretended by that number' [i.e. they must feign themselves to be a single unit] cf pp 73–8, 113, § 1. Schlozer proceeds to describe such a collective Ruler as a 'being composed of several individuals' or a 'corpus', but [though he thus seems to recognise group-existence,] he really remains a thorough-going individualist, even to the extent of holding that in a republic 'a new Ruler is created for each new decision of the government' [because a new majority composed of different individuals has to be created], and therefore a 'momentary Ruler' is all that can exist in such a State cf p 113, § 2, p 125, § 9, p 131, § 13.

187. The 'common will', which (he remarks) thinkers from Rousseau onwards have irresponsibly identified with the 'common man',* is nothing

* Or, as we might express it, the 'general will' (which is the term that Rousseau really uses) is too readily identified with the 'general run' of people. Or again, to

The common will a sum of wills

but the 'sum of all individual wills', and therefore it is only sovereign in pre-political society, where pure unanimity is the rule. In the organised State, even if it be an extreme democracy, it is always a number of particular persons, or a single person, which wills and decides for all. The people, which gives such persons or person their commission, is simply tricked, by means of frequent elections, into thinking that it wills and decides through its representatives, or it is dazzled with the illusory idea that 'law is the true sovereign'—the fact being that law, as an abstract thing, can only act through men [and therefore can only be sovereign through the person, or persons, who declare and enforce it]. Cf pp 76–7 [of A. L. von Schlozer's Allgemeines Staatsrecht, which Gierke is paraphrasing here, as in the previous note].

188 The social contract, according to A. L. von Schlozer, produces only a 'union of powers', and a 'union of wills' first arises through a supplementary contract of government, by which each man promises that 'others shall will instead of him, and that he will acknowledge this will, external to himself, as his own will, and shall be compelled, if he break his word, to recognise that it is his will'. It is this fact (that 'the most part renounce their will, and transfer it to one man, or to a number of men, or to the majority') which is the basis of majority-decisions, representative assemblies and the rights of rulers, op. cit. pp 76–9, 93, § 1. The Ruler, being able to will and decide for all, is the 'depository of the common will', pp 95 and 100.

189 C. von Schlozer, De jure suff. in soc. aeq. (of the year 1795), § 11. In agreement with the theory of his father (A. L. von Schlozer), he adds that the societas mere talis is only a 'union of powers' to begin with, a new 'pact', by which each man surrenders his will, is necessary before a 'union of wills' can exist, and the comparison with a persona is only permissible when that pact has been concluded. He proceeds (§ 12) to attack the other arguments of the advocates of the majority-principle, on whom he significantly seeks to impose the burden of proof (§ 10). He frankly holds that any decision of any society requires an agreement of all its members, depending on their pactum et consensus (§ 9), and accordingly he will only recognise a decision by the major pars if it is based on special pacta adiecta to that effect (§ 15)—with the proviso that these pacta adiecta can never extend to the pacta fundamentalia, or the jura singulorum, or affect either (§ 18). He will not even allow that the absent are automatically bound by the vote of those present (§ 13) such a principle can only be introduced by specialia pacta (§ 19).

190 Cf p. 190 'the conception of a moral person can thus be understood in the broad sense in which it includes every collective "Subject" or owner of rights and duties, whether such collective "Subject" be a society groups or no'. See also pp. 53, 66, 106, 206, 244, 292, 307 sqq., 310, 317 sqq.

put the matter in another way, we may say that the solonté générale properly means a will that is general in respect of the quality of the object willed (which is the general good), but tends to be identified with a will that is general only in respect of the quantity of the subjects willing (or the general mass of the people). The confusion is inherent in Rousseau's thought, but it must be added, in fairness to Rousseau, that he did attempt to reconcile the two conceptions, feeling that the general mass, by the process of discussion of ideas which is the essence of the democratic system, was most likely to arrive at a general sense of what was really for the general good. In other words, the process of general thought, in the general body of a community, is the right way to the general good, which is the object of the general will and the sovereign standard of community-life.

*The will of the Ruler
as representative*

C. von Schlozer on the majority-principle

Hoffbauer's theory of groups

Hoffbauer's theory of Groups

191 Pp 191sqq and 199sqq originally, unanimity was alone valid, but the majority-principle may be introduced by means of a unanimous resolution, provided that it be understood that the majority-principle has no validity in regard to the constitution, or as against the rights of a member.

192 Pp 205sqq accordingly (Hoffbauer argues) it is the Ruler alone—or some 'society' which participates in Ruling authority—that appears in the area of internal public law as a 'moral person' (pp 244, 246, 292, 307, 310), and the People itself appears as person only in the area of [external, or] international law (pp 317sqq.).

193. W. von Humboldt's Ideen, p 130, cf §18 infra [on the natural-law theory of corporations]

194 See, more especially, II, c 7, §89, c. 8, §§95-9, c 12, §145.

195 II, c 8, §96

196 II, c 8, §§97-9 without a provision to that effect, the original contract would not achieve its aim of ending the state of nature, it would not produce at all, or would only produce for a brief space, a society with the qualities of a 'body incorporated' it would thus be without significance, and not a real contract at all

197 I, c 6 d' l'instant, au lieu de la personne particulière de chaque contractant, cet acte d'association produit un corps moral et collectif composé d'autant de membres que l'assemblée a de voix, lequel report de ce même action son unité, son moi commun, sa vie et sa volonté [The reader will readily note, in this passage as elsewhere in the Contrat Social, how much Rousseau is indebted to the writers of the School of Natural Law alike for his thought and his vocabulary. His personne particulière is the usual persona singularis his corps moral et collectif is the corpus morale collectivum. We may almost say that the vogue of Rousseau depends on the fact that a great master of style gave to the world of letters, and the general reader, a system of thought which had hitherto been expressed mainly in Latin, and written by lawyers for lawyers.]

See in addition II, c 2, on the indivisibility of sovereignty which issues from the unity of the corps social, II, c 4, on the nature of sovereignty as an absolute power which the social body necessarily possesses over its members, just as the individual has un pouvoir absolu sur ses membres, and III, cc 10-11, on the sickness, age and death to which corps politiques are subject in the same way as the physical bodies of men, and on the art of prolonging their existence (le corps politique, aussi bien que le corps de l'homme, commence à mourir dès sa naissance, et porte en lui-même les causes de sa destruction). [On the birth and death of 'moral bodies' cf supra, nn 174 and 179.]

198. Cf I, c 6, where Rousseau explains that the personne publique, which is constituted by the union of all other persons, is called République or corps politique, but that it is also termed by its members (1) État, when it is passive, (2) Souverain, when it is active, and (3) Puissance, when it is compared with similar bodies outside. Cf also I, c 7, where he speaks of a personne morale, or être de raison, which in regard to foreign bodies is un être simple, and in regard to its subjects is le Souverain II, c 1, where he speaks of un être collectif, and II, c 4, where a personne morale is in une volonté * speaks of un être the 'Subject' of political authority

Its personne morale the 'Subject' of Sovereignty

199 II, c 3 Il y a souvent bien de la différence volonté générale, celle-ci ne regarde qu'à l'intérêt coprivé et n'est qu'une somme de volontés particulières les plus et les moins qui s'entredétruisent, reste pour être la volonté de tous et la n, l'autre regarde à l'intérêt

s être de ces mêmes volontés ne des différences la volonté

Its volonté générale

générale. [It is interesting to compare Rousseau, on this fundamental matter, with Pufendorf: see nn 131, 132, 136. There is of course a difference, but Pufendorf is the rock from which Rousseau hewed.]

200 iv, c 2, where we also find an argument to prove that liberty is not destroyed by this agreement to respect majority-decisions. It is my own will that the volonté générale should be law, if I am out-voted, that shows that my view about the volonté générale was mistaken. I really willed what is now shown to be the volonté générale, and I did not really will what is now shown to be only my volonté particulière. Cf also ii, c 2 n.

201 It is presumably always directed to what is right and beneficial: it is incorruptible, simple and clear, without subtleties, and attained with little if any debate. It will not, and cannot, decree anything contrary to equality and justice: no guarantees are needed against it, and all that is required is the prevention of any deception. Cf i, c 7, ii, cc 3-4, iv, c 1.

202 i, c 6: d l'égard des associés, ils prennent collectivement le nom du peuple, et s'appellent en particulier Citoyens, comme participants à l'autorité souveraine, et Sujets comme soumis aux lois de l'État

203 It follows that the size of the State diminishes liberty. With 10,000 citizens, each has one ten-thousandth part of sovereign power 'for his share' with 100,000, only one hundred-thousandth part, but in both cases each is soumis tout entier. Cf iii, c 1.

204 i, c 7, each pledges himself by the social contract sous un double rapport comme membre du Souverain envers les particuliers, et comme membre de l'État envers le Souverain, a contract thus made avec lui-même is possible, because each contracts envers un tout dont on fait partie. Cf ii, c 4.

205 i, c 7, ii, cc 1-2, iii, c 16

206. But the Sovereign can never incur such obligations towards a third party as contravene the act on which its own existence depends i, c 7.

207 The reason why the Sovereign can never bind itself as a whole to its members is this (i, c 7): the body politic, being only able to view itself always under one and the same rapport, would by contracting with one of its own members be dans le cas d'un particulier contractant avec soi-même [i.e. since the sovereign is, and must always regard itself as being, identical with its members, it cannot contract with what is itself, any more than an individual can contract with himself]. But the original contract of society is apparently an exception to this rule, cf n 204 supra].

208. iii, c 12-14. Any formal exclusion of a single citizen annuls the general will (ii, c 2 n.).

209 Cf iii, cc 14, 18 cf also the argument, in iii, c 11, that the sovereign will of yesterday does not bind that of to-day (la loi d'hier n'oblige pas au-jour-d'hui), and therefore the validity of [past] laws depends on the presumption that the sovereign is always confirming them tacitly by not revoking them.*

210 iii, c 12 the sovereign can only act quand le peuple est assemblé

211 Cf ii, c 1. le Souverain qui n'est qu'un être collectif ne peut être représenté que par lui-même Cf also iii, c 15 sovereignty can no more be represented than it can be alienated, because though power can be transferred to others,

Rousseau on majority-decisions

On the quality of general will

His Sovereign can never bind itself to its subjects

Yesterday's will not binding to-day

Rousseau on representation

* Cf Paine's Rights of Man, where the same idea is applied to each generation. 'Altho' laws made in one generation often continue in force through succeeding generations, yet 'they continue to derive their force from the consent of the living and the non-repealing passes for consent'.

will cannot be elected deputies of the people cannot be representatives, but only commissaries or delegates. What le Peuple en personne does not enact is not law, the people which is 'represented' is no longer free, and no longer a people.

The 'organic' metaphor in Rousseau

212 Although the legislative power is compared to the heart of the body politic, and the executive to its brain, and the importance of both for political life is measured by that comparison (III, c. 11), this solitary reference to the analogy of the organism remains without influence on Rousseau's general interpretation of Group-personality [But cf. also note 197 supra].

Rousseau's view of 'Govern-ment'

218 III, cc. 1-5, 16-17. The gouvernement is un corps intermédiaire between the Sovereign and the members of the State. It is un tout subalterne dans le tout, it is a new personne morale dans la personne publique. Since its province is simply the execution of the sovereign will, and since, in its capacity of ministre du Souverain, it holds a commission which can be limited at will and is always subject to recall, the 'government' has no will of its own, but has merely une vie empruntée et subordonnée. None the less it requires, if it is to fulfil its object, a unity of its own and its own special qualifications, and it therefore develops, in virtue of the authority with which it is vested, une vie réelle, un moi particulier, une sensibilité commune à ses membres, une force et une volonté propre, qui tend à la conservation. It is thus, in small, ce que le corps politique qui le renferme est en grand. There are different ways in which it may be constituted, but it is always a Whole with a definite totality of power, part of which it employs in order to keep its own members in co-operation, while it retains the rest for the purpose of acting upon the whole people. Three wills meet in this government—the individual wills of its component members, the common will of them all, and the general will of the whole State—but in a perfect condition of things the first of these would be non-existent, and the second would only be the expression of the third.

It is a collective person

214 In III, c. 1, Rousseau terms the 'person' of the government a personne morale et collective, une par la force des lois et dépositaire dans l'État de la puissance exécutive. Its essential difference from the sovereign 'person', he holds, consists in the fact that it only exists in virtue of the Sovereign, and not, like the Sovereign, per se. As a whole, it is called the 'Prince', and its members, who may be collective persons themselves in their turn,* are called 'magistrates'. In a monarchy, however, the government (according to III, c. 6) is identical with a 'personne naturelle' toute au contraire des autres administrations, où un être collectif représente un individu, dans celle-ci un individu représente un être collectif'

215 Filangieri (I, cc. 1 and 11, VII, c. 53) follows Rousseau's theory entirely.

Sieyès generally follows Rousseau

216 Cf. Sieyès, I, pp. 50sqq., 129, 144 ('a political society cannot be anything but the associated members of such society when taken together'), 167, 445sqq., II, pp. 195sqq.

217. Cf. I, p. 129 the common will is a unity, but its essential elements are the wills of individuals, only they are no longer isolated. Cf. also I, p. 145, where it is said that 'the will of the individual is the only element in the social will', and I, p. 167, where the will of the Nation is said to be 'the result of the will of the individual, because the nation is a sum of individuals', and where it is argued accordingly that this will can never be mediated or expressed by estates or corporations, but only by heads [i.e. by direct individual suffrage], on the basis of a general unity and equality. Similarly Sieyès remarks (i, p. 207) that the common will of a social group 'must naturally be the general sum of the wills of all individuals', cf. also pp. 431sqq

* I.e. a 'college' of magistrates, which, as such, is a collective person, may be one of the parts of government.

218 Cf. i, pp. 144-5, 167, 207-8 for the future, he argues, we must ascribe the quality of a general will to the will of a majority this is based on the fact that each submits himself freely in advance, with a reservation of the right to emigrate [if he disagrees with the majority-will] his staying in the country is a tacit confirmation of the obligation he originally assumed, and thus the common will always continues to be the sum of individual wills

219 For Sieyès' views on representation see i, pp. 68sqq, 129-30 (where he speaks of government conducted by proxy, and of the representative will of an assembly of deputies, in which the common will is, as it were, in communion), 134, 140sqq, 195sqq, 208sqq (where deputies are described as representatives, with a general mandate, which remains none the less at the free disposal of those who gave it, and is thus revocable as well as limited, so that the decision of the representatives is 'the product of the generality of the wills of all individuals'), 375sqq, 385sqq, n, pp. 275sqq and 372-4 (where it is argued that everything in the social state is a matter of representation, and that men increase their liberty when they allow themselves to be represented in as many ways as possible, just as they diminish it when they accumulate a number of different representative capacities in one person)

220 Cf. ii, pp. 371sqq there is, essentially, only one political authority, but there are different forms of representation based on different mandates

221 This is the case with Scheidemantel, the Schröders (father and son), and Hoffbauer, cf. pp. 126-7 supra, and nn. 183 and 186-90 to this section.

222 Cf. Fichte's Naturerecht, ii, pp. 19-21 (Works, iii, pp. 204-6) it is only Fichte and 'hypothetically' that the individual is also a subject, for he only becomes Rousseau such if he fails to fulfil his duties. Cf. also Works, vii, pp. 153sqq

223 See, for all this, the Naturerecht, ii, pp. 15-18 (Works, iii, pp. 202-4) cf. also ii, pp. 23-4 (Works, iii, pp. 207-8)

224 Naturerecht, ii, pp. 17, 19, 23-4, 34sqq (Works, iii, pp. 203, 204, 207-8, 215sqq) In the later Rechtslehre (Posthumous Works, ii, pp. 495 and 632) he still holds that the whole is only the 'totality of the members', and that there can be nothing in the whole which does not exist in a part

225 Thus he remarks that 'physical, or mystical, persons' may either of Fichte on them exercise public authority, but he proceeds to explain a 'mystical person' as being the majority at any given time, and therefore as 'frequently also a variable person', Naturerecht, i, pp. 191 and 195 (Works, iii, pp. 159 and 161) Again, arguing that marriage is a natural and moral society, he counts husband and wife as 'one person', and he draws the conclusion that, within the household, there is complete community of property, though externally the one 'juridical person' is represented by the husband alone, who can act for his wife along with himself similarly a married couple, as one juridical person, has only one vote, which is given by the man, though his wife may also give it on his behalf in the popular assembly if he be prevented from doing so, but unmarried and independent women have their own right to vote (Naturerecht, ii, pp. 158sqq and 213sqq = Works, iii, pp. 304sqq and 343sqq). Cf. also ii, p. 1 = Works, iii, p. 191

But Sieyès admits representation

226 Naturrecht, II, p. 250 = Works, III, p. 371 Rechtslehre, p. 638

227. Naturrecht, I, pp. 122sqq and 180sqq = Works, III, pp. 102sqq and 150sqq. Rechtslehre, pp. 507sqq and 627sqq. No account can be given here of the subtle chain of deduction by which Fichte attempts, in his Naturrecht, to solve 'by a strict method' the problem 'of finding a will such that it is simply impossible for it to be other than the common will, or, in other words, a will in which private will and common will are synthetically united', nor can we attempt to describe the modifications in the solution of this problem which are introduced in the Rechtslehre.

Fichte on the majority principle

228 Naturrecht, Introduction, III, and vol. I, pp. 198, 217sqq, 225sqq = Works, III, pp. 16, 164, 178sqq, 184sqq. Absolute unanimity is needed not only for the political contract, but also for every alteration of a 'constitution based on Right and Reason' (though any person may take in hand the transformation of a constitution which is not based on Right into one which is) relative unanimity is sufficient for the election of individual magistrates, and also for decisions of the people in regard to a magistracy or Ephorate which has offended against Right, i.e. a very considerable majority (say seven-eighths) may exclude dissentients from [participating in the action of] the State on such issues.

229 Naturrecht, I, pp. 179sqq, 196, 201sqq, 206, 210-16, 222sqq = Works, III, pp. 150sqq, 163, 166sqq, 170, 173-7, 182sqq, see also Works, IV, pp. 298sqq. For the exercise of its sovereignty the People must assemble as the 'community', though in great States it need not assemble in one place, but may gather 'here and there in really considerable bodies'.

Fichte on representation and on 'Ephors'

230 Naturrecht, I, pp. 179sqq and 192sqq = Works, III, pp. 150sqq and 160sqq. In order that the common will, which shows itself primarily in the unanimous will of all, may always remain a really common will, the exercise of public authority must be transferred to one or more persons (the Executive), and this transference involves in its turn the appointment of representatives of the people to watch the Executive (the Ephorate, or body of 'overscers'). The reason which Fichte gives is significant since both the law-breakers and the injured persons, who represent private wills, are simultaneously also members of the community, it follows that the community [if it attempted to deal with the conflict, instead of leaving it to its representatives] would be both judge and party to the suit in the case at issue between the two sides. [We may note that Fichte's 'Ephorate' has an ancestry it goes back through Althusius to Calvin, cf. supra p. 248.]

The People always finally Sovereign

231 Naturrecht, I, pp. 192, 204-9, 224 = Works, III, pp. 160, 169-73, 183 thus he speaks of the responsibility not only of the government, but also of the ephorate, of the final decision of the community, of the right of revolution in the last resort, and of the total cancellation, by the community's immediate declaration of its will, of any assumption seeming to suggest the expression of that will by those who are really its executors.

232 Naturrecht, I, pp. 213-15 = Works, III, pp. 175-7.

233 Such an organic conception appears in the Grundzüge des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters (Works, V, pp. 144sqq), the Reden an die deutschen Nation (ibid. pp. 380sqq), and the Staatslehre (ibid. IV, pp. 409sqq and 419sqq).

234. In particular, he never attains any conception of the State's personality.

235. See Kant's Metaphysik der Sitten, Works, VII, pp. 1 and 20.

236. Works, VII, pp. 120-3 and 142-6

287. Works, vii, pp. 161 and 165, and the essay Zum ewigen Frieden, vi, pp. 405^{qqq} Kant derives the whole of international law from the axiom that States stand to one another in the position of 'moral persons' in the state of nature—subject, however, to an obligation of Right that they should enter into a system of legal relations. Arguing that it is wrong to abolish the existence of the State as a moral person, and to turn it instead into a mere 'thing', he deduces from that argument the illegality of arrangements by which one State can acquire another, as if it were a thing, through inheritance, purchase, exchange or donation, or by which 'States can marry one another', as has hitherto been the usage in Europe [cf. tu, felix Austria, nube].

Kant's view of States as moral persons

288 The three powers are 'the united common will expressed in three persons' (Works, vii, p. 131) they are 'co-ordinated' with one another 'as so many moral persons', but at the same time they are also 'subordinated', under a system by which each of them, 'while commanding in the capacity of a separate person, issues its commands under the limits imposed by the will of a person who is superior' (ibid. vii, p. 134). The supreme Head of the State can be either 'a physical or a moral person' (ibid. vi, p. 323, vii, p. 134) the high court of justice is 'a moral person' (ibid. vii, pp. 25 and 97). People and Sovereign, 'legally considered, are always two separate moral persons' (vii, p. 138).

Authorities in the State moral persons in Kant's view

289 Kant often opposes the 'State', in the sense of the Ruler, to the 'people' (e.g. vi, pp. 418 and 421), but, conversely, he often defines the 'State' as 'a union of a multitude of men under rules of law' (vii, p. 131), and he thus identifies it with the 'People' (vii, p. 131).

Kant on the State and
People

290 Works, vi, pp. 327^{qqq}, vii, pp. 131 and 133. The people becomes a State when omnes ut singuli surrender their external freedom, in order to receive it back again at once ut universi, 'as parts of a common existence, i.e. of the people regarded as a State', all now decide about all, and therefore each about himself, and since no man can do wrong to himself, this is the origin, and the only origin, of binding law.

Kant on the will of the People

291. Works, vi, pp. 327-8 and 416-20, vii, pp. 54, 62-3, 66-7, 106, 131-2 Kant always speaks of the 'will of the whole people', 'the agreement of all', 'the united will of a whole people', 'a collectively general (or common) will vested with power', 'the united will of all', 'the consentient and united wills of all', etc. In doing so, however, he limits the right to join in expressing this will to those who have the right to vote—a class which does not include those who work for wages—though he admits the principle of equal voting by heads within this class (vi, pp. 327-8).

Kant on the
will of the People

292 Works, vi, pp. 328-9, cf. pp. 331 and 336, where the Supreme Head of the State appears as the 'representative' or 'agent' of the sovereign power, and where it is argued accordingly that 'his will gives commands to his subjects, as citizens, only because he represents the general will'.

Kant on 'phenomenal'
and 'noumenal'
Man

293 Cf. vii, pp. 36-7, where Kant, arguing that the theory of law, like that of morals, is a theory of duties, contends that man can and must be considered, from the standpoint of such theory, 'in the light of his attribute of possessing capacity for freedom—a capacity which is wholly supra-sensual—and therefore in the light of his pure human character, as a personality independent of physical determination, in contradistinction to himself in his other character of a being affected by such determination, i.e. a member of the human species (homo phaenomenon)'. See also p. 153, n. E, where Kant explain it a subject who is undergoing a penalty is, as such, a different homo to the 'co-legislator' who enacts the penal law 'When I pass a penal law against myself as a law-breaker, what happens is that the pure law-giving Reason in me (the homo noumenon) subjects me to that law as one capable of breaking it, and therefore as another person (the homo phaenomenon), at the same time that it subjects all the other members of the civic association' Cp. the consequences derived from this distinction [of noumenal and phenomenal man] in the Tugendlehre (pp. 195sqq, 222, 241sqq, 244sqq), where they are made to include (1) the possibility of a duty which one must enforce upon oneself, (2) the absolute value of persons, as ends in themselves, and never means to ends outside themselves, and (3) the possibility of being one's own court of law

244 Cf. Works, vi, pp. 329sqq, vii, pp. 158-9 and especially p. 173

*The survival
of the 'organic'
metaphor*

245 We find such analogies with the organism drawn by a number of writers. Spinoza (cf. Tract. pol. c. 2, §15, c. 3, §§1, 2, 5, and Eth. iv, prop. 18 schol.) generally describes the civitas as unum corpus with una mens. Pufendorf (J. n. et g. viii, c. 12, §7) expounds a theory of the 'three species of bodies' (natural, artificial and moral), and ascribing to the moral species a unity which is produced by a vinculum morale, and remains constant through all the changes in its composition, he concludes that the State, as an example of the moral species, est res quaedam unica et continua, animalis instar. Hertius, in the De modo const. sect. 1, §§2-3, speaks of una quasi persona, seu unum corpus, which remains identical through all changes and preserves permanent attributes, and of an anima in corpore, existing in virtue of an impersum, cf. his Annotationes to Pufendorf's Jus nat. et gent. 1, c. 1, §3 n. 4—quamquam negari queat entium moralium et naturalium magnum interdum esse similitudinem, e.g. corporis humani et civitatis, quae etiam corpus vocatur et animam sue vitam habere dicitur (see also p. 122 supra). Analogies with the organism are also drawn by Gundling, De unv. deling. §§6-8, Schmier, 1, c. 3, no. 66, J. H. Bochmer, P. spec. 1, c. 2, §§1-2 (corpus morale, and unus spiritus), Achenwall, n. 180 to this section. Note also the elaboration of the analogy with the various limbs and organs of the natural body by Knichen (Opus pol. 1, c. 6, th. 11, where head, eyes, tongue, ears, hair, arms, feet, joints, heart and neck are found for the corpus mysticum ad corporis vni verique modum concinatum, and reference is made to the similar, if in some respects different, jeux d'esprit of Guevara, Facius and Hobbes)

246 Cf. supra, nn. 195, 197 and 224 to this section

*The idea
of the mechanism*

247 This idea [of an artificial imitation of the living organism] appears in Spinoza, loc. cit. We also find it in Pufendorf, who expressly commends the analogy with homo artificialis (n. 144 to this section), and argues (J. n. et g. viii, c. 12, §7) in favour of the permanent unity of the 'moral body' from the axiom laid down by Hobbes in his Philosophia prima, c. 2, §7, that si re alicui propter formam talam, quae sit principium motus, nomen inditum sit, manente eo principio idem est individuum. The idea also appears in Hertius (supra, n. 148 and n. 160 to this section), in Gundling (n. 163 to this section), and other writers, cf. also Horn, supra p. 115

248. Cf. supra, pp. 128-130 and 131-4. Rousseau even describes the governing body, in so many words, as a corps artificiel which is created by another corps artificiel, iii, c. 1.

249 We thus find the analogy of the organism entirely absent from the writings of Thomasius, Wolff, Darnes, Nettelbladt, the Schlözers (father and son), Hoffbauer, W. von Humboldt and Kant. Mercier de la Rivière explicitly says that a nation is not a corps unique, and that it has no single will. ce qu'on appelle une nation en corps n'est donc jamais qu'une nation rassemblée dans un même lieu, où chacun apporte ses opinions personnelles, ses prétentions arbitraires et la ferme résolution de les faire prévaloir A majority is never more than a 'collection of interests' and a variable 'result of egosms', and unanimity is impossible (c. 18).

250. A. L. von Schlozer says (p. 3) that 'the most instructive way of dealing with the theory of the State is to treat the State as an artificial machine, entirely composed of assembled parts, which has to operate for a definite end', cf. pp. 99, 157. Kant similarly speaks of the 'mechanism' or the 'machine-like character' of the constitution of the State, and describes the State as 'the mechanical product of the union of the people by coercive laws' (Works, VII, pp. 157-8). Sacyès, though he does not wholly succeed in avoiding the comparison with a body (I, pp. 283 sqq. and 445 sqq.), bases the State entirely on 'the mechanics of social art' which reason provides (I, pp. 128, 195 sqq., 217 sqq., II, p. 370). [Tom Paine, would-be engineer and bridge-builder, similarly uses mechanical analogies in his Common Sense of 1776 e.g. 'as the greater weight will always carry up the less, and as all the wheels of a machine are put in motion by one, it only remains to know which power in the constitution has the most weight, for that will govern']

251. We find thus [failure to face the problem of Group-personality] in Praschus, Placcius, Alberti, Filmer and other anti-individualist thinkers. It is also to be found in Justi. It is true that he emphasises strongly the organic nature of the 'moral body', arguing that the commonwealth is 'a single indivisible body, which has the closest connection in all its parts', and seeking to prove, by this argument, the necessity of a single group-authority controlled by a rational will, the existence of a system of mutual interaction by which all the parts affect one another and the whole, and the pernicious results of any superfluous part which contributes nothing to the general system. But he has nothing whatever to say about the personality of the State or the people (cf. his Natur und Wesen, §§ 23-6, 28, 45-50, and his Grundriss, §§ 15, 17, 23 sqq., 29 sqq.).

252. Mevius for example, though he makes it the object of political association ut una velut persona sit, cui una mens, unus sensus, una voluntas et anima inter multos velut una aliae eadem, makes the unity of this person depend for its existence entirely on the submission of all other wills to the will of a representative Ruler (see n. 125 to this section). In the same way S. de Coccceji will only recognise a representative and collective unity of [group-]persons,* notwithstanding the fact that he extends the conception of the social body, with authority over its members, until it is made to embrace the State, the Corporation, the [College of] Magistrates and the Family. The result is that all these bodies remain for him corpora artificialia seu mystica, except that the Family is magis naturale than the rest. Cf. his Nov. Syst. §§ 199, 205, 280-1.

258. Leibniz argues (Nova methodus, § 16) that the legal 'Subject' (the subiectum of a 'moral quality' which may be either a right or an obligation) can be either a persona or a res. Defining the former as a substantia rationalis, he then distinguishes between personas naturales (Deus, angelus, homo) and

* I.e. they are 'one' in virtue of being 'represented' by a single agent, or 'one' in the sense of being a collective aggregate of wills, but not 'one' inherently and in themselves.

*The State
a machine*

Failure to face the problem of Grouppersonality

Leibniz's theory of associations

persona civilis (colleguum, quod qua habet unam voluntatem certo signo dignoscibilem—e.g. ex pluralitate votorum, sorte, etc.—ideo obligare et obligari potest). He regards a res as the 'Subject' of rights and duties when e.g. property is left to an affidatum, or an officium is made responsible for some act, and generally in any case of jus reale.

He describes a persona civilis seu moralis, in so many words, as a persona ficta, brought into existence ad instar naturalis by an artificial union of wills, and to be regarded, in the last resort, as an aggregate or collection of rights. In iure republicae persona eius civilis seu moralis continetur, nam omnes personae civiles seu fictae corporum, collegiorum, universitatum in aggregatione jurum consistunt (Spec. dem pol prop. 1, p. 525) persona civilis omnium jurum collectio est (ibid prop. 57, p. 585), cf. also the Introduction to Cod. gent. dipl. 1, § 22, p. 306, and Caesar-Fürst c. 11. He regards the person of the State as identical with that of the Ruler, and he makes it accordingly a persona naturalis in a monarchy, but a persona civilis in a republic (Introduction to Cod. gent. dipl. loc. cit., Caesar-Fürst, loc. cit., Spec. dem pol prop. 1, 12, 57). In international law, therefore, both 'natural' and 'civil' persons are in his view 'Subjects' of rights (Introduction to Cod. gent. dipl. loc. cit.), but he argues that if friendship is nowadays rare inter principes (Spec. dem pol prop. 41, p. 560), neither friendship nor enmity is possible inter Republicas. Such feelings arise ex animo, and animus non nisi personarum naturalium est, civilium nullus, and [while the 'civil person' of a republic thus cannot have friendship or enmity with another State, because it has no animus, neither can the 'natural persons', or individuals, who constitute such a corporate person, because these] natural persons and their animi are in a state of perpetual flux (ibid prop. 42, p. 561).

For a critique of the view recently advanced by C. Ruck (Die Leibnizsche Staatslehre, Tübingen, 1909)—that Leibniz understood the personality of the State in our modern sense, and created the legal notion of 'organ' to express the relation of the Ruler to that personality—see the author's review in the Deutsche Literaturzeitung of 1910, pp. 566–8.

254. Any such legal conception of Group-personality is not to be found in Montesquieu, Vico or Ferguson. Frederick the Great has some elements of the conception on the one hand, he represents the State as an animate body with limbs and organs, and explains its birth, its maladies, its death, and the peculiarities of its nature, by means of a comparison with the individual man (Antimach. cc. 3, 9, 12, 20; Considerations, in his Works, viii, 24, Essai sur les formes, ibid ix, 197sqq.); on the other hand, he regards the Ruler as only [an 'organ', or] le premier serviteur et premier magistrat de l'État (Antimach. c. 1, Mémoires, in his Works, i, 123, last Testament, ibid vi, 215, Essay, ibid ix, 197), but in spite of these two complementary ideas he never attains to any clear expression of State-personality.

Justus Möser knows nothing of any 'person' of the State (Patriot Phant. 1, no. 62) he even disputes the right of a nation to give itself freely a new constitution, on the ground that it is 'not a single being in itself', but is composed of two classes which, if either is united internally, are only connected together in their relations with one another as separate parties to a contract (Misc. Writings, i, pp. 335sqq.).

Herder again—however vigorously he may champion the idea of development, however resolutely he may insist on regarding the life of a people as the common life of an organism, however frequently he may speak of a national spirit and a national character—none the less fails to transcend a mechanical conception of monarchical institutions when he seeks to analyse actual States (Ideen, ix, c 4, xix, c 6). While he traces 'the first breath of a common existence' in the constitutions of towns, guilds and universities, he never carries his account of the 'body politic' to the point where he reaches the conception of an immanent Group-personality (ibid xx, c 5).

§17 THE NATURAL-LAW THEORY OF THE STATE

1 Cf Huber, i, c 1, §§12-23, Hert, i, 1, pp 18sqq., J H Boehmer, Universal P gen c 3, §§118sqq., Schmier, Jus publ univ., Diss praeambula, Daries, public law P spec §§654sqq., Achenwall, ii, §§85-7, Heincke, Proleg c 1, §10. By all these writers jus publicum universale is identified with jus publicum naturale, or with a part of jus sociale naturale, and the distinction drawn between public law and political theory is explained as consisting in the fact that the State is considered in the former ratione justi, and in the latter ratione utilis. J H Boehmer was the first to compose a separate compendium of jus publicum universale [or, as French writers express it to-day, 'droit constitutionnel comparé'] under that title.

2 At first we find no distinction drawn, by those who are engaged in attacking the older doctrines, between the pure theory of the sovereignty of the people and the theory [of the co-existence] of majestas realis and personalis: cf. Micraelius, i, c 10, §§12sqq and qu 7, pp 112sqq., Cellarius, c 9, §§18-25, Felwinger, De maj §§22 and 41, Huber, i, 2, c 3, §24, i, 3, c 1, §§11-20, Pufendorf, J n et g vii, c 2, §14, c 6, §4, and De off hom. et civ. ii, c 9, Thomasius, Instiitutum iii, c 6, §121, J H Boehmer, P spec i, c 4, §22 n; and iii, c 2, §5, n x, Schmier, ii, c 1, s 2, §1, nos 48sqq.

Gradually, however, both of these theories [that of popular sovereignty and that of 'double majesty'] were lumped together, and any conception of majestas realis was stigmatized as a product of 'monarchomachism'. Horn [who wrote about 1660] is already condemning 'real majesty' as a monstrum and fabulosus foetus: indeed he even declares the theory of 'real majesty' a criminal theory, and expresses a pious wish for the execution of its advocates, adding that, if they live in a neighbouring 'plebeian' State, a request addressed to that State for their execution would be warranted by international law (ii, c 10, §§11-15). See in addition Ziegler, i, c 1, §§44sqq., Boecler, ii, c 1, pp 93-8 (where the theory of real majesty is said to be a theory of regicidae), Beermann, c 12, §11, Hert, Opusc i, 1, pp 307-19, Kestner, c. 7, §9, Stryck, Diss. xiv, no. 7, c. 2, no. 54, Gundling, Jus nat c 38, §22 (such theories are inventio otiosi ingenii), Alberti, c 14, §3, Heinicus, Praelec i, c 3, §§8-9 and Elem jur nat ii, §§130sqq., Rachelius, i, tit 32, §2 (the theory is summa perniciosa), Heincke, i, c 2, §15, c 3, §4, Krentmayr, §5; Scheidemantel, i, pp 111sqq. (where even the theory of Rousseau is described as a theory which makes 'real' majesty exist by the side of 'personal', and is controverted accordingly).

Fortunes of Grotius' theory of the subjectum
commune

8. Thus Bocmann writes (c. 12, §7): subjectum majestatis est tum Respublica seu persona moralis quam Respublica indat, tum personae singulares quae moraliter istam representant. But what he understands by Respublica is no more than universitas or omnes simul, and he proceeds to assume a system under which this collective body is represented by the Imperans so perfectly that neither is superior or subordinate to the other, but the one stands to the other in the same relation as an object does to its reflection in the mirror. Cf. also Treuer, on Pufendorf, De off hom. et civ II, c. 7, §9 (respublica perpetuum majestatis subjectum manet), Rachelius, I, ut. 32, §2, Mullerus, I, c. 7, §65.

4. Schmier, for example, holds that it is possible to follow Grotius in assuming both a subjectum commune and a subjectum proprium, provided that the distinction be interpreted as it is by Boecler and van der Muhlen in their notes to Grotius—i.e. provided that it be understood to refer merely to the inseparable connection of majesty with the corpus republicae rite formatum and the possible reversion of that majesty to the people (II, c. 3, s. 1, §1). Kulpis (in his Exercit. ad Grotium, II, §6 n.) and Hert (p. 298, §12) take a similar line. Ickstatt interprets the subjectum commune of Grotius as signifying merely the original sovereignty of the people, and he therefore prefers to substitute the terms subjectum constitutum and actuum [for subjectum commune and proprium], cf. Opus II, no. 1, c. 1, §12.

5. Cf. Horn, II, c. 11, §1, Pufendorf, Juris naturalis VIII, c. 6, §4, De off hom. et civ. II, c. 9, Kestner, c. 7, §9, Boecler, Instit. II, c. 1, Alberti, c. 14, §3, Stryck, Diss. XIV, no. 7, c. 2, no. 55, Heincke, I, c. 2, §15, c. 3, §4.

6. Cf. supra, pp. 111 and 115–6, see also, for answers to Horn's theory, Huber (I, 3, c. 2, §§7–9) and Pufendorf (Juris naturalis VIII, c. 5, §§5, De off hom. et civ. II, c. 8, §4).

7. See Spinoza, Tract. theol.-pol. c. 16, Tract. pol. c. 6sqq., Micraelius, I, cc. 10, 13–15, Huber, I, 3, c. 2, 1, 7, c. 1, Pufendorf, Juris naturalis VIII, c. 5, De off hom. et civ. II, c. 8, Leibniz, Spec. pol. dem. prop. 16–18, Hert, Opus I, I, pp. 319sqq., Titius, VIII, c. 7, §§17–28, Bossuet, II, art. 1, J. H. Boehmer, Pr. spec. I, c. 3, §13, c. 4, §§29–34, Schmier, I, c. 3, Heiniccius, II, §§116sqq., Wolff, Instit. §§990sqq., Jus nat. VIII, §§131sqq., Daries, §§147sqq., Nettelbladt, §§133, 1153sqq., Achenwall, II, §§149sqq., Scheidemantel, I, pp. 39–40, Hoffbauer, pp. 206 and 295sqq., A. L. von Schlozer, pp. 75sqq. and 95, §2. The last of these writers states 'the Ruler is the Ruler, the depository of the common will, be he one, or some, or many: crown, sceptre and throne are essentialia in Schaffhausen and in Stamboul!'. This principle 'overturns once and for all the insolence of the single ruler, and awakens the democrat from his dreams of liberty' [i.e. it shows to the one that he is but a depository, who has received his authority as a depositum—'a thing for custody, to be redelevered on demand'—as it shows to the other that even in the democracy of his dreams there cannot be absolute liberty, without any sceptre or throne, since while there is a society with a common will man cannot be, as Shelley dreamed,

Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed, the king
Over himself]

On the other hand we find Gundling contending (Juris naturalis c. 37, §§3–10 and Disc. c. 36) that, while there is rule by una persona even in a republic, this 'person' is only moraliter una, and the process of deliberation which must necessarily precede its decisions makes the suprema potestas weaker.

Sovereignty
the same in all forms
of State

⁸ Cf Huber, 1, 2, c. 3, and his Opera minora, 1, no. 2, c. 7, Pufendorf, J n et g vii, c. 2, §14, c. 6, §§4sqq., Alberti, c. 14, §3, Hert, Opus 1, 1, pp. 311sqq., Gundling, c. 37, J H Bochmer, P spec 1, c. 4, m, c. 2, Titius, vii, c. 7, §§20-6, H Coccej, Prodramus, S Coccej, §§617-18, Schmier, II, c. 4, s. 2, §2, no. 109sqq., Heiniccius, II, §138, Ickstatt, Opus 1, op. 1, c. 1, §§14-15, Krentmayer, §5

In developing these ideas, the thinkers of this age were no more successful in eluding the contradictions which they inevitably entailed than those of a previous age had been (cf. supra, p. 43 and n. 43 to §14). Most of them assumed that there must have been, even in a democracy, a formal translatio imperii, which had taken the form of a contract of subjection made with a permanent popular assembly or a majority thereof (See Micraelius, c. 10, §§9sqq., Huber, 1, 2, c. 3, §§25sqq., c. 4, §§1sqq., Pufendorf, J n et g vii, c. 5, §§6-7, De off hom et civ 11, c. 6, §9, Beccmann, c. 12, §§4sqq., Hert, Opus 1, 1, pp. 286sqq. and 317sqq., Kestner, 1, c. 7, §3, Heiniccius, II, §§129sqq., Daries, Praecepta §24 and Jus nat §§658-60, Ickstatt, §§8sqq.). Those who made this assumption were forced to suppose that the other party to the contract [i.e. the party other than the permanent popular assembly or a majority thereof] was either (1) the sum of all individuals, or even (2) a minority of those individuals,* and they were thus compelled to make democracy an exception from the general scheme which they applied to all other forms of State. [Strictly speaking, we may argue that on the first hypothesis, i.e. the hypothesis that the sum of all individuals contracts with the popular assembly, there will be no exception from the general scheme, which makes all individuals contract with a Ruler, but there will be the difficulty, or the absurdity, that the two parties to the contract are the same, and A is merely contracting with A. On the second hypothesis, i.e. the hypothesis that a minority of individuals contracts with the majority of the popular assembly, this difficulty or absurdity disappears, because the parties are different, but there is now an exception from the general scheme, because it is only a minority (and not, as in the general scheme, all) which is the other party to the contract with the Ruling authority.]

Other thinkers dropped the idea of a contract of subjection altogether in treating of democracy, and only spoke of a separate agreement or decision (following on the primary contract of society) to retain sovereignty instead of transferring it. This idea, which agrees with the doctrine of Suarez, appears particularly in Schmier, II, c. 1, s. 3, §3 and c. 4, s. 2, §3, and he is led by its logic to argue that the reversion of original sovereignty to the people [in a case where that sovereignty has not been retained, but transferred] does not ipso facto produce a democracy, but only the possibility of instituting either that or another form of State [according as the people, now in possession of the reversion of its sovereignty, decide either to retain it or to transfer it]. The idea may also be traced in Wolff, Instut §982 and Jus nat vii, §§37 ff., Nettelbladt, §1132, and Achenwall, II, §§96-98 and 174-179. But the thinkers who propounded this idea failed to explain how the nature of social authority could be changed [i.e. how vague popular sovereignty could pass into a definite democratic authority] when the 'Subject' of such authority underwent no change.

10 Spinoza, Tract theol-pol c. 16, Tract pol cc. 6-11. It is true that

* The other party which contracts with a majority of the popular assembly may naturally be supposed to be the minority.

The problem of interpreting democracy in terms of contract

Spinoza on monarchy

Spinoza regards an omnino absolutum imperium as desirable only in a democracy, which he considers the most natural and perfect of all forms of State—or, to a less extent, in an aristocracy. But just for this reason [i.e. just because he confines absolutism to democracy or aristocracy], he rejects monarchy, as being a form of government which is necessarily absolute by its very idea, and he substitutes for it a mixed constitution. [Strictly speaking, Spinoza does not 'reject' monarchy. He argues that, potentia being jus, the form of State which has most potentia will have most jus, and he criticises monarchy accordingly, not because it is absolute, but because it cannot be absolute—in other words because one man cannot, however much he may try, possess as much potentia (by which Spinoza means mainly power of intellect) as a number will possess, and cannot therefore possess as much jus. Having criticised monarchy as defective in power, and therefore in right, Spinoza proceeds to fortify it, in the seventh chapter of the Tractatus politicus, by a great council, which will bring intellect to its service, and by a number of other devices. We may call this a mixed constitution, and it is, in effect, a mixed constitution, but Spinoza was thinking of a fortification of monarchy, and not of a mixture of different political elements. On his own theory monarchy remains, in its fortified condition, as a possible form of State—not rejected, but not preferred, even in its fortified condition, to other forms.]

11 Filmer, who rejects in his Patriarcha all forms of State except monarchy, regards monarchy as necessarily absolute

12 Bossuet (ii, art. 1, iii, art. 2-3, iv, art. 1; v, art. 1, vi, art. 1-2, viii, art. 2, x, art. 6) argues that the people cannot be conceived apart from the Monarch, because he is l'État même, and while les fondamentales may secure liberty and property, they only bind the monarch [internally] in virtue of the authority which they derive from God and reason, and never oblige him externally. A similar view appears afterwards in the Physiocrat absolutists, who simply eliminate the theocratic elements in the older theory cf. Mercier de la Rivière, c. 14, p. 102, c. 17, p. 129, cc. 19, 23-4 (the only rational form of State is a legal despotism, an absolute hereditary monarchy, where, the private interest of the monarch coinciding with the interests of his subjects, the mathematically evident and inevitable principles of the ordre social reign undisturbed).

13. Cf Cellarius, c. 9 ('he who is limited by fundamental laws is no longer sovereign'), Pelzhoeffer, II, c. 3, Beckmann, c. 12, §§4-7, Boeckler, II, c. 1. Mevius also (Prodromus, v, §§23sqq.) regards all the rights of the universitas as absorbed in its single, plenary and exclusive 'representation' by the will of the Ruler, and holds that by the law of nature the potestas imperantium is necessarily una, summa, absolute, soluta legibus et rationibus non obnoxia. On the other hand the supreme authority must do nothing whereby societas pereat vel infirmetur it must not, therefore, bring the State under a foreign yoke, alienate land, alter the fundamental laws or exercise tyranny (§30), and it must use bona publica only for usus publici, and impose taxes only in case of necessity. Cf, in the same sense, Alberti, c. 14, §§3-10.

14 Horn, De civ. II, c. 10, §§1-15. In a limited monarchy, summa potestas resides exclusively in the monarch, and it is only its 'exercise' which is limited: the monarch can therefore, in case of need, break even the rules of the constitution, which can never be anything more than a contract to which he has freely assented. The obligation imposed on him by an oath to the

French
theories of monarchyGerman writers on monarchyHorn's view of monarchy

constitution is only a religious obligation, and he can never be deposed, because he has no Superior

15 Pufendorf attacks Hobbes for making the two conceptions [that of 'supreme' power, and that of 'unlimited' power] interchangeable. cf J n et g vii, c 6, §13

16 J n et g vii, c 2, §14, De off hom et civ u, c 6, §11, cf n 132 to §16

17 J n et g vii, c 2, §14 If populus is understood to signify a 'Subject' or owner of rights (venum aliquid unam habens voluntatem et cui una actio tribua potest), it becomes identical with civitas and its will becomes identical with that of the Ruler, and thus the paradox holds good in a monarchy that Rex est populus But if populus is understood to mean the multitudo subditorum, as contrasted with the homo vel concilium habens imperium, it ceases entirely to be a unit to which any ownership of rights can be ascribed, and the theory of the 'right' of resistance, which confuses multitudo with populus and proceeds, on the basis of that confusion, to the impossible conception of a rebellion of the civitas against the Rex, is as absurd as it is seditious On the other hand individual subjects of the State continue to be the possessors of separate wills, although they are merged in a corpus morale with una voluntas (J n et g vii, c 4, §2, De off hom et civ u, c 7, §2), and as possessors of separate wills, they continue to be 'natural' Subjects or owners of rights, to whom the Ruler owes obligations and to whom he may do an injustice (J n et g vii, cc 8-9, viii, c 1, De off hom et civ u, cc 9, 11) But individuals cannot appeal to any coercive sanction in support of their natural rights they must endure the misuse of the State's authority as men endure storms and bad weather. they must go into exile themselves rather than expel their ruler, but they may be competent to resist if the worst comes to the worst and the fundamental contract itself is broken (J n et g vii, c 8, De off hom et civ u, c 9, §4)

As compared with this exposition, Pufendorf's attempt to prove the possibility of an obligation existing between optimates and cives in an aristocracy is both obscure and involved in self-contradiction In dealing with this possibility, he not only invokes the argument that, although populus ut persona moralis expravit, the personae physicae are still there he is even willing to contend that the people does not become a multitudo dissoluta (though it ceases to be a persona perfecta) after the transference of its sovereignty, and he alleges in favour of this contention the argument that 'at any rate when there is a Senate, to serve, as it were, as its head, the people forms a person' (qua utique jam cum senatu tanquam capite suo personam constituit, cf J n et g vii, c 5, §8) [Pufendorf's view appears to be that while a people with a King as its head is not a person, a people with a Senate as its head is, and his reason may perhaps be that while there is some similarity between the people and a Senate, and while the two may both somehow be 'persons', there is a great difference between the people and a King, who is so distinct from his people that he is a unique 'person', and they in comparison are only a dissoluta multitudo But whatever his reason may have been, he certainly falls into self-contradiction, for after proclaiming (in the preceding paragraph) that there is only one 'State-person', he allows two to enter in an aristocracy (1) the 'person' of the concilium habens imperium, and (2) the 'person' of the people, with this council serving as its head]

18 J n et g vii, c 6, §§13-17 In dealing with bona publica Pufendorf follows a similar line [to that which he follows in dealing with political

Pufendorf's view of popular rights

Normal monarchy and State-property authority]: he assigns ownership of such bona to the curtas qua talis, and he ascribes to the king only the position of a 'tutor', debarring him from alienating bona publica except by consent of the people. J. n. et g. VIII, c. 5, §8, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 15, §5. At the same time he regards a monarch appointed for a fixed time as something inconceivable

19. J. n. et g. VII, c. 6, §§7-12, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 9.

20. Instit. iur. div. III, c. 6, §63 (definition of the State as a persona moralis composta, which can will and act as a unit through the Ruler), §§115-26 (on the nature and attributes of majesty), §§127-31 (on the difference between an imperium absolute and an imperium limitationis with fundamental laws), §§132-41 (on the possible varieties in the modus habendi). But Thomasius prefers to call 'non-patrimonial monarchies' by the name of fides commissaria rather than by that of usufructuaria (§135),* he does not consider a monarcha temporarius to be absolutely inconceivable (§§122-6), and he does not allow that there can ever be a right of resistance to the sovereign (§§119-20).

21. Spec. iur. publ. VII, c. 7, §§17-28 and 30. In a curtas which is una, vera et perfecta, constitutional limitations do not affect the suprema potestas, but only the modus exercendi.

22. To some extent, indeed, Gundling may be said to be nearer to the theory of Hobbes than he follows him, for example, in the interpretation he places on the original contract (cf. supra, pp. 60 and 108), in his conception of the Ruler as the soul of the State (cf. n. 161 to §16 above), and in the description he gives of the authority of the State (Jus nat. c. 36 and Disc. c. 35). But he recognises contracts made with subjects as binding (Jus nat. c. 12, §§43-6 and Disc. c. 11, §§43-6), and he limits the principle that in a normal State the people has no right of resisting the Ruler who breaks his contract, by remarking that, all the same, no injustice is done to a tyrant when he is expelled (Jus nat. c. 38, §§19-23 and Disc. c. 37, §§19-23).

23. The commentators on Pufendorf similarly adopt his views (e.g. Otto, Treuer, etc.), although with some reservations.

24. H. Coccej, Prodrumus, S. Coccej, Novum syst. §§617-18, 633 (there can be no alienation of territory without the consent of the people, except in regna patrimonialia), and §638 (there is no right of resistance).

25. Diss. XIV, no. 7, De absoluta principis potestate, c. 3, and Diss. IV, no. 1, De statibus provincialibus, c. 1, nos. 22sqq. and c. 4.

26. Opus. II, op. 1, c. 1, §§13-15 (see n. 170 to §16 above) and §66.

27. Grundriss, §§5, 11, 32, 34, 35.

28. Systema, I, c. 3, §§5, 13, 26, III, c. 1 (there is never a jus resistendi).

29. The same homage to Pufendorf's authority is also, and especially, to be seen in the treatises which describe the positive public law of the German territorial principalities.

30. Boehmer, like other thinkers of his time, regards the personality of the State as residing entirely in the Imperans (whether a person or a body of persons), and he makes the will and act of this Imperans count, externally and internally, as the will and act of all for every purpose falling within the area of the State's function (P. spec. I, c. 2, §18, c. 3, §§1, 15-21). This representative 'Subject' or person necessarily possesses, as its jus proprium et independentia, a 'majesty' which vests it with two sorts of consequential rights—the rights of free action appertaining to the state of nature (so far as external relations are concerned), and the jus summum imperii (including all the particular powers required by the State's function), so far as internal regulation is concerned (ibid. i, c. 4) * But though this 'majesty' is indivisible, equal at all points, all-embracing, permanent, and subject to no positive law, the sovereign who possesses it still remains bound by the lex naturalis (P gen c. 1, §§ 14-22). He has therefore duties as well as rights in regard to his subjects, and these duties are derived partly from the nature of civil society [as based upon natural law] and partly on specific contracts [which rest upon the same basis] On the other hand the obligation thus arising, if it is perfecta for his subjects, is only imperfecta for him, and therefore there is never any right of coercion or resistance as against him (P spec i, c. 2, §§ 18-21 and iii, c. 2, §§ 9-25) Further, it is only individual subditi who confront the sovereign as 'Subjects' or owners of rights the community of the people, as such, has no personality (ibid. iii, c. 2, §§ 4-6)

* See nn. 30 and 35 infra, on the difference.

Boehmer admits that there are various forms of State, 'according as the nexus constituted by pacts is stricter or looser' On the one hand, there are regna herilia, where imperium has been extended, by means of contracts to that effect, beyond the limits required by the State's function on the other, there are regna limitata, where the Ruler is subject to limitations imposed by contract, and there are also hereditary and elective monarchies (or imperia patrimonialia et non patrimonialia), though the latter must not be called by the name of usufructuaria† (ibid. i, c. 3, §§ 30-6, ii, c. 3, § 15, iii, c. 4, § 15). But the people never has any share, stante imperio, in the exercise of political authority, and it has therefore no legislative or judicial capacity, and no right of resistance or deposition (i, c. 3, §§ 25-6, ii, c. 3, § 14, iii, c. 2, §§ 4-16 and c. 4, §§ 32-3) If, therefore, the sovereign is bound by leges fundamentales, qua pacta, he alone can interpret such laws or pacts, and he cannot be forced to observe them (iii, c. 2, § 13 and c. 4, § 16) Should he break the rules of the constitution, the people is bound to obey, and even if the clausula nullitatis be added to any rule—e.g. if the performance of an act of government without consultation of the representatives of the people be expressly declared to be null and invalid—the nullity of an act done in contravention of that proviso can only be established by the next successor, and not by the people itself (i, c. 4, § 1) The position is different, Boehmer allows, vacante imperio, since sovereignty reverts to the people in the event of such vacancy Even here he adds a qualification (iii, c. 4, pp. 9-11) Vacancy, he argues, can occur in a non-patrimonial monarchy without the consent of the people coming into play, as the result of an alienatio regni [in which case there will be no reversion to the people, and no consent of the people]. [See also n. 33 infra]

31 Kestner, for example, though he follows Pufendorf in other respects

* Boehmer's argument may be illustrated by a pedigree

The fundamental right of majestas (jus proprium et independens)

† Cf. supra, n. 20, where Thomasius is quoted as rejecting this name in favour of fides commissaria For the difference between the two, see n. 35 infra, and Huber's explanation there given.

(c. 7, §§3sqq), allows the people a ius resistendi where there is evident tyranny (§19).

32. We find this view in Ludewig, I, 1, op 8, c 1, Kestner, c 7, §§11-12; Hemeccius, II, §§147-9. On the other hand the conception of the patriarchal State is retained not only by Thomasius, Coccejus and Boehmer (see nn 20, 24 and 30 supra), but also by Huber (I, 3, c 2, §§16sqq), Schmier (n, c 2, s 2, §3), Wolff (Instit §986), Nettelbladt (§1198), Achenwall (II, §§158-73), and others.

*Vacancy
of the throne
and the rights of
the People*

33. J H Boehmer, for example, expressly treats de iuribus subditorum vacante imperio (P. spec. III, c 4). He distinguishes two cases of vacancy: (1) totalis interitus reipublicae, which dissolves the 'body civil' and leaves the ground clear for a fresh act of association (§§2-3), and (2) simple disappearance of imperium, which transforms any State in which it occurs into a democracy, and thus makes the people capable of a fresh translatio imperii (§§4sqq). A testamentary disposition by a deceased Ruler does not bind the people in the latter of these cases, even if he were competent to alienate his kingdom (§§7-8). * Vacancy of imperium may arise through an alienation made ultra vires (§§9-11), or through death (§§12-16), if there are no rights of succession to prevent the vacancy (§§17-27), or through abdication (§§28-31); but not through deposition (§§32-3). [We may remember the vote of the Convention Parliament of 1689—that James II 'has abdicated the government' (or imperium) and 'the throne is thereby vacant'. On the other hand we may also remember that 'abdication' here was a euphemism for deposition.]

Of Thomasius, Instit. III, c. 6, §§67-114, Fund. III, c 6, §§9-10, and Boccler, II, c 1.

34. Filmer and Bossuet reject simultaneously both an original and a revisionary sovereignty of the people. In a similar way we find Horn deriving the succession to the throne from the expressed or presumed will of the previous Ruler (II, c 9, §§7-18), and refusing to allow any eventual reversion of majestas to the people, though he concedes the reversion of an original ius eligendi, II, c 11, §1 [provided there be no expressed or presumed will of the previous Ruler?]. He regards the people without a Ruler as a corpus sine anima, and therefore a cadaver [but how, we may ask, can a cadaver exercise a ius eligendi?]

35. Huber, De iure civ. I, 2, c 1, §§16, 20, c 3, §24, cc 5-7, I, 3, cc 1-2. Even in imperia heredita or despotica, he argues, all that is added is simply an increase of the efficacia of majesty (I, 3, c. 2, §§10-15). Conversely, if we turn [from these absolute forms to the less absolute, i.e.] to imperia patrimonialia and non patrimonialia (and the latter of these, Huber remarks, is not a case of a mere right of usufruct, but of a limited right of property, properly to be regarded as a quasi-usufruct, and analogous to a fides commissum or the property of a man in his wife's dowry), † we merely find a difference in the

* Ergo, the will of the King of Spain in 1700, leaving his possessions to the grandson of Louis XIV, did not bind the people of Spain.

† These subtleties are fascinating. A King who rules a non-hereditary monarchy (e.g. a King of Poland in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries) has neither a mere usufruct in an imperium which is the property of another, nor the full ownership of an imperium which is his own property. He is in a half-way house, which, however, is nearer to ownership than to usufruct. He is like a man who is the holder of what we may roughly call a trust-property (the fides commissum of Roman Law),

*Absolutist
views of popular rights*

Huber on monarchy

modus habendi of majesty [but not in 'majesty' itself], ibid. §§ 16–31. It is a matter of indifference, Huber adds, whether the summa potestas is acquired volente or invito populo, by election or by inheritance, in perpetuity or for a period (§§ 32–50), and the size and style (i.e. form) of the State are matters of no significance (§§ 51–6). See also his Instit Rep. 1, cc. 3–5

36. De jure civ. 1, 2, c. 3. We must neither follow Hobbes in exaggerating sovereignty to a point at which the people becomes a mere flock of sheep (§§ 3–8), nor the author of the Vind c Tyr and Althusius and other writers in minimising it until Rulers become nothing more than ministri popularum (§9). The truth is that a contract between king and people is the basis of their relations (§§ 17–20), and in interpreting this contract we must start neither from Hobbes' view that the people necessarily devolved the whole of its rights, nor from the view of Althusius that the people could not in any way alienate its supreme authority, but rather from the assumption that there is at one and the same time a real alienation of majesty and a reservation of popular rights which limit its exercise (§§ 21–51). Cf. 1, 2, cc. 4–7, 1, 3, cc. 1, 4–5, Opera minora, 1, no. 2, cc. 1–7

He admits limits on the monarch

37. De jure civ. 1, 3, c. 5. Fundamental laws are binding in virtue of natural [and not of positive] law: they are not to be confused with 'privileges' or pacta cum singulis

38. Rights of the people [as a whole, and as against the government] exist even in a democracy, where they arise from the limits imposed on majority-government (1, 2, c. 3, §§ 39–51) they also exist, to the same extent, in an aristocracy and a monarchy when the case is one of translatio simplex (ibid. c. 5). Cf. 1, 3, c. 4

He allows rights of the People

39. De jure civ. 1, 3, cc. 4–5

40. Huber (in 1, 3, c. 5, §§ 23 sqq.) investigates these limits [limits imposed on the ruler by 'express fundamental laws'] in some detail. If we start from a theory which makes all limitation of the summa potestas purely 'constitutional' in character [i.e. dependent on express constitutional rules], we are not precluded by our basis from believing in a provision which makes the assent of the people, or an approbatio in senatu, a necessary condition of the validity of certain of the Ruler's acts (1, 3, c. 2, § 57), nor are we, again, precluded from believing in a voluntary submission of the Ruler to private law and the civil courts (1, 9, c. 5, §§ 7–25). What we are precluded from holding, on that basis, is that the Ruler can really be bound by ordinary positive law, or subject to any coercion whatever, for we cannot suppose [as we should have to suppose if we tried to hold such a view] either (1) that the Ruler possesses a power of command and coercion over himself, or (2) that the people can be legally secured in the possession of such a power over him—except, indeed, at the price of a simultaneous cession by him of part of the imperium (1, 3, c. 1, §§ 10, 24–38, 1, 9, c. 5, §§ 26–49). But the people possesses a right of resistance in defence of its rights against a Ruler who breaks his contract, since the question then raised is one of natural, and not of positive law (1, 9, c. 3); and the people may even punish a tyrant

His theory of express fundamental laws or he is like a husband who has a sort of property in his wife's dowry. Just as the former's trust-property is subject to the request (or 'precative disposition') of the testator, and as the latter's property in the dow is subject to certain limits in favour of his wife, so the king in a non-hereditary monarchy has a property subject to the 'request' of his people, or to certain limits in favour of his people. And the people itself is a testator, or a wife, or anything else, but not a living or masculine proprietor

*Huber identifies the State
and the Ruler*

*Yet he recognises
the People
as a universitas*

*He would limit all governments by popular
rights*

when once he has proceeded to forfeit his imperium, either by violating the lex commissoria, or by manifestly going beyond his rights (1, 9, c. 4).

41. For this identification of the person of the State with that of the Ruler, cf. the following dicta in Huber's De jure civili: civitatis per eos quis habent summam potestatem personas sunt (1, 3, c. 6, §26), summa potestas est ipsa civitas (1, 9, c. 5, §51); voluntas imperantium est voluntas civitatis (1, 3, c. 2, §14 and c. 6, §26), again, because the civitas jus personae habet, the Ruler (who is the civitas) can bind by legislation his individual subjects, who are diversae personae, but he cannot bind himself (1, 3, c. 1, §32) [since that would be a case of the same 'person' binding and being bound at the same time]. See also 1, 9, c. 5, §§65-72. It follows from Huber's argument that if the Ruler submits himself voluntarily to the courts in private-law cases, he is prosecuted and sentenced nomine suo in semet ipsum.

42. Huber argues, with particular reference to the opposite opinion of Hobbes, that the people, when transferring sovereignty, unum quod est, it retains the jus personae [after that transference], and remains a universitas, quoniam nec congregatus sit neque sciat tempus futuri contentus, and therefore it can have rights against the Ruler, and, in particular, can effectively reserve such rights [at the time of transference], or acquire them by virtue of subsequent contracts (1, 3, c. 4, §§8-83 and c. 5, §§58-9).

43. Starting from democracy as the form of State which approaches nearest to the state of nature, Huber begins by enumerating the reservations which are implicitly made [in favour of the whole people] under a democratic constitution, when the will of the majority is made the Ruling Will (1, 2, c. 3, §§25-51 and c. 4), and he then argues for the existence of the same reservations [in favour of the whole people] in all forms of State, on the ground that the Ruler in any form of State has merely taken the place of the majority (ibid. c. 5). But he goes further, and he argues with some warmth in favour of express constitutional limitations on 'majesty', such as are common in monarchies, but are seldom to be found in democracies, and only infrequently in aristocracies, where they are particularly necessary (1, 3, c. 4, 1, 7, c. 1, 1, 8, cc. 2-4). In our century of oppression by princes [the seventeenth], he says, it is particularly necessary to champion the cause of liberty, but if it is particularly necessary in monarchies, it is also necessary in Republics (1, 2, c. 8).

44. [There is a contradiction involved in Huber's attempt to limit democracy by the rights of the people, because] in dealing with democracy he tries to assign to a minority the popular rights which he vindicates elsewhere for the community. He assumes the existence of two pacts (one between singulis and singulis, and the other between minor pars and major pars), and vindicates a facultas resistendi for the minority in the event of a breach of the latter of these pacts [by the majority], cf. 1, 2, c. 4, §§1-25.

45. Cf. e.g. Micraelius, 1, c. 10, §§9-16 and qu. 1-5, pp. 108sqq (where there is also an argument for the right of resistance in case of necessity), Felwinger, De mai §§27sqq, von Seckendorf, Fürstenstaat, II, c. 4, c. 7, §12, III, c. 3, no. 8, Möser, Patriot. Phant IV, no. 51. The same tendency appears in many of the exponents of positive constitutional law.

46. Seckendorf, for example, qualifies the idea of sovereignty (though he describes it as a 'supreme and final power of command for the preservation and maintenance of the common advantage and existence') in two ways—by insisting strongly on the responsibility which attaches to sovereignty in virtue of its being an office (Fürstenstaat, II, c. 1, Christenstaat, II, cc. 6-7), and by rejecting entirely the notion that the sovereign is exempt from positive law (Fürstenstaat, II, c. 4, § 2).

Fénelon, too, though he believes in the necessity of an autorité souveraine, which creates the body politic by giving it unity, and brings about a pooling of powers (multiplication des forces) in that body, and though he adds that this authority must necessarily be 'absolute' (c. v), none the less protests against any identification of such a final and supreme authority of the last instance with mere arbitrary and unlimited power (c. xi), and he therefore attacks despotisme des Souverains as well as that de la populace, while he eulogises a monarchy qualified and moderated by the rights of the people (c. xv)—notwithstanding the fact that he refuses to recognise any original sovereignty of the people or any right of resistance (cc. vi and x). [For the view of sovereignty as an 'authority of the last instance' cf. Loyseau, Traité des Seigneuries, II, § 6 la Souveraineté est le comble et la période de la puissance où il faut que l'Etat s'arrete et establisse. Loyseau, writing about 1610, was a natural authority for Fénelon, writing towards the end of the seventeenth century. We may also note (1) that Loyseau made a distinction between sovereignty in abstracto, which was a property inherent in and attached to the State and sovereignty in concreto, which was the exercise or enjoyment of that property by a person or body of persons (though he proceeds to confuse this distinction by arguing that a king 'may acquire by prescription a property in sovereign power, and thus add property in it to exercise of it', Traité des Offices, II, c. 2, §§ 25-6), and (2) that it was a tradition of the French lawyers, from Bodin onwards, that even if 'majesty' were a 'supreme power, exempt from laws', this only meant exemption from positive laws of the ordinary sort, and majesty was none the less subject (a) to 'fundamental laws' such as the Salic Law ('which are connected with majesty itself', Bodin, De rep. I, 88), and (b) to the lex divina, the lex naturae and the lex omnium gentium communis (ibid. 84).]

47 Cf. supra, p. 137.

48 Cf. Leibniz (Caesar-Furst, Praef. pp. 329sqq., cc. 10-12 and 26-33) on the degrees of majestas, supremitas and superioritas, on the possible discrepancy between the internal and the external position of the sovereign, and on the possibility of division and distribution of political authority. We may note especially (c. 11, p. 360) the defence of these views against Hobbes and other writers: they are very ready, Leibniz writes, to produce a monstrum, but their conception of sovereignty is only in place in ea Republica cuius Rex Deus est [i.e. in a State where omnipotence really exists], it does not apply to any civilised State, or even to Turkey, and it contradicts human nature. We may therefore say that Leibniz believes that the supremitas of the Prince is not destroyed by the existence of a contract guaranteeing rights to the people or the Estates, or even by the presence of a lex commissoria [which delegates imperium to be exercised as a fiduciary power derived from the community], cf. c. 33.

49 Thus we find Titus, Treuer and Hert censuring Pufendorf for adopting Hobbes' identification of the Imperans and the Civitas, and similarly we find the first two of these, along with Otto, blaming him for not introducing 'fundamental laws' as limits upon the representation of the State's will by the will of the Ruler (Comm. on II, c. 6, §§ 10-11 of the De off. hom. et civ., Titus, Observ. 159, 557).

Fénelon's qualification of sovereignty

[Compare Loyseau's views]

Leibniz's theory of sovereignty as relative

People and Ruler as both personae

50 Hert, it is true, makes 'the person of the State' reside entirely in the summus imperator, but he holds none the less that a persona et corpus may be attributed to the people, quatenus primum pacto continetur [i.e. so far as it is constituted a 'person' and a 'body' by the original contract]. As a collective person, which comes into existence by virtue of the original contract of society, the people has nihil commune cum imperio [i.e. it is not a 'Subject' or owner of rights in anything like the same way as the Ruler], but it may acquire rights afterwards by contract or by prescription. Again the populus conjunctus pacto primo continues to survive even when the pactum secundum [i.e. the contract of government or subjection] is dissolved, and it has in that case to re-constitute the pactum secundum afresh. cf Opusc. I, I, pp 288, 291, 295-8.

Schmier regards the summa potestas as the soul of the State, and he makes the 'Subject' or owner of this power 'the person of the State' (n, c 1, s 1, §§1-3) But he also holds that the populus collective sumpitus continues to possess a status of its own as against the Ruler. It was the original 'Subject' of sovereignty (n, c 1, s 3), sovereignty reverts to it vacante imperio (n, c. 3, s. 1, §1, c. 4, s. 2, §3, v, c. 2, nos. 65-9), it is at all times a universitas capable of possessing rights (v, c 2, s 1, s 2, §3, c 3, s 2, §§2-3) [He proceeds to classify those rights] (1) Like individual subdit, the community in general enjoys everywhere certain reserved rights (n, c 4, s 1, §1, v, c. 2, s 1) more especially, no change of the succession, and no alienation or mortgage of any of the rights of sovereignty, can have any validity in a 'non-patrimonial' State without the consent of the people (n, c 2, s 1, §§2-3 and s 2, §3) (2) The people may also acquire extensive rights in virtue of contracts or leges fundamentales (n, c 4, s 1, §2, v, c. 2, s 1, nos 6 and 8)—such as, for example, the right of giving its assent to laws (m, c 2, nos 28-30), and it may similarly acquire rights by prescription (n, c. 2, s 3, §2, nos 174-200). The summa potestas may thus be either 'absolute' or 'limited' [according to the degree of these popular rights] Yet even where it is limited, it still remains intacta, although there may be certain acts of the Sovereign which have no validity without the consent of the People or the Estates, and even although a lex commissoria may be imposed upon him (n, c 1, s 2, §2) The community has no right—at any rate in cases where it is not the real and true sovereign itself—to resist or depose the Ruler who has broken his contract, unless it be by way of self-defence against a Ruler who has become hostis apertus (n, c 4, s 2, §2, v, c 2, s 1 and c. 3, s 1). [The rights assigned to the people in the first part of this argument would thus appear to be denied in the second part]

Heineccius, while emphasising the exclusive representation of the State by the Ruler, and insisting on the unity and indivisibility of sovereignty, yet recognises the people as possessing the collective personality of a societas aequalis, and he also admits that, besides the popular rights which are everywhere established, in all forms of State, there may also exist additional popular rights in virtue of special constitutional provisions to that effect (Elem. II, §§129-149, Prael. academ. I, c 3, §8 cf note 32 supra)

51. Insti. §§979-89. Jus nat. VIII, §§29-36.

52. Insti. §989, Jus nat. VIII, §§37sqq. Even the representation of the people by the Ruler in the sphere of external relations, Wolff adds, is merely a matter of presumption, but when any different arrangement has been established by fundamental laws, that arrangement is effective only if, and so far as, it is known to other peoples (Insti. §994).

53. On Wolff's distinction between imperium absolutum and limitatum, see his Jus nat viii, §§66sqq. and Instit §983, and on the application of this distinction to various forms of the State, Jus nat loc. cit §§1314qq and Instit §§990sqq. In dealing with the nature of leges fundamentales Wolff views them as contracts, which it is beyond the legislative competence of the Ruler to modify, but which may be altered by the people, provided that they are not entirely based on an act of voluntary self-limitation by an otherwise unlimited Ruler, and provided also that such alteration does not affect adversely the acquired rights of the Ruler or his successors (Jus nat loc. cit §§77sqq., and Instit §§984, 989, 1007, 1043). The people, in his view, has a duty of unconditional obedience, even where there is abuse of the summum imperium, and he regards as inadmissible any proviso which makes the duty of obedience cease in a case of bad government. On the other hand, he constantly insists on the right of passive resistance, whenever any order is issued which contravenes the commands or the prohibitions of Natural Law, or whenever, in a constitutional State, the limits of the fundamental laws are violated. He even regards the people as a whole, or the injured part thereof, as entitled to offer active resistance whenever an attack is made on the rights reserved to the people—on the ground that in such a case there is a reversion to the state of nature, and each must therefore protect his rights for himself (Jus nat loc. cit §§1041–7, Instit §§985, 1079, Polit §433).

54. Syst nat §1132 potestas civilis est originaliter penes omnes eues simul sumptus, a quorum arbitrio dependet an, quomodo, et in quem eam transferre velint it is only where the foundation of the State has proceeded from some third party [distinct from both people and government] that the position is different.

55. Loc. cit §§1133sqq., 1153sqq. There is indeed (Nettelbladt argues) a presumption against any limitation of the Ruler by the recognition of jura popularia to share in the exercise of potestas civilis, and [still more] against any limitation of his rights by the admission of the people to the status of joint-holders of supreme authority, but there is equally a presumption in favour of a view of monarchy as merely 'usufructuary', under a system in which jura potestatis are vested entirely in the princeps, but the jura circa potestatem reside as entirely in the people (§§1198–9). In all forms of State the civil power is subject, by the nature of the case, to limes and officia, and the Res publica therefore confronts the Superior as a 'Subject' or owner of rights (§§1127, 1134). In the event of an open transgression of limes, the people has the right of revolt (§1270). The conception of sovereignty is so much attenuated in the theory of Nettelbladt that he makes mere potestas civilis (die Hohheit im Staat) the criterion of the State, and even holds that the summa potestas (la souveraineté) may be subordinata thereto (§§1125–9). [If summa potestas can thus be 'subordinate' to civilis potestas, the sovereignty which is indicated by it cannot be more than the 'courtesy' title of sovereign, as when we speak of 'our sovereign Lord the King'. It is not a true summa potestas in the legal sense—the authority of the last instance, which finally decides.]

56. Loc. cit. §1200: the princeps, as a 'public person', is a person in the state of nature, who is one with his people (una persona cum populo) in the sphere of external relations.

57. In a monarchy the populus is always a persona moralis distinct from the king; but in its character of a moral person the people varies—sometimes

Wolff's view of popular rights

Nettelbladt on popular rights

Nettelbladt on the People as a moral person being altogether subditus, sometimes retaining reserved powers, and therefore [and to that extent] remaining in statu naturali, sometimes possessing political authority jointly with the prince, and therefore living, along with him, in the state of nature (§ 1201). The same position also exists in an aristocracy, as between the populus and the collegium optimatum (§ 1217). In a democracy, on the other hand, the Senate is a persona moralis subdita populo, non in statu naturali suens (§ 1220), as also are all the magistrates (§§ 1226sqq.).

On the Estates as a moral person

58. Loc cit §§ 1210–12 The Estates exercise the rights of the people 'in their name' (whether these rights be merely the general rights circa potestatem, or particular rights of exercising authority [apart from the prince], or rights of sovereignty* shared with the prince), and therefore they 'represent the people, and have its rights'. We have thus three separate 'Subjects' or owners of rights [the Ruler, the People, and the assembly of the Estates] who may all live in a state of nature, for the 'body of the Estates', in so far as it exercises rights of sovereignty in the name of the people, is also free from subjection [and therefore in a state of nature].

59. Naturacht, pp. 240, 244, 246, 292sqq., 308sqq., 317

60. Loc cit p. 310

61. Daries holds that the essence of the State requires an imperium sumnum and an imperans (§§ 655sqq.). The content of majesty is always the same (§§ 667sqq.) The 'Subject' of majesty may be either a collective person or an individuum (§§ 747sqq.). But there are limites majestatis—both the natural, which are to be found in all forms of State, and the pacituti, which are found in constitutional States in addition to the natural (§§ 780sqq.). Limited monarchy, where the people has only given a consensus conditionatus, and where the Ruler is bound by leges fundamentales vel capitulationes, is none the less monarchy, and the creation of ordines imperii with powers of supervision, or even the presence of a pactum commissorum [a Wahlkapitulation, pledging the monarch at the time of his election?], does not turn it into a mixed form of State (§§ 786–9).

Daries on sovereignty
and its limits

62. Achenwall regards all curtates ordinatae as based on facta fundamentalia, which cannot be altered by unilateral action (II, § 109). By the principles of 'universal absolute public law', the contract of government issues in an imperium sumnum plenum et illimitatum, either of the 'people', or of a 'physical person', or of a 'moral person' (§§ 112sqq.), but by 'universal conditional public law'† the imperium may be limited by 'fundamental laws', and we thus find, by the side of absolute monarchy, monarchia minus plena and monarchia limitata—the monarch, in the latter of these two varieties, being obliged to act by the consent of the people, and the people possessing either a corregimen de facto or a formal co-imperium (§§ 148sqq.).

Achenwall
on constitutional types
of State

63. Scheidemantel holds that every State requires 'a common Head', who represents the 'majesty' of the State, and is either the whole society, or some of its members, or one (I, pp. 38sqq.). Majesty, as 'the highest form of existence in the State', is not subject to any laws, but may be bound by divine commands and by the fundamental laws which it has accepted for itself by contract (I, p. 116).

Scheidemantel
on the limits of majesty

* Strictly speaking, the word Hoheit (which is here translated as sovereignty) means something different from sovereignty in Nettelbladt, being identified with civis potestas and distinguished from la souveraineté (n. 55 supra, ad finem). But it is difficult to render the word otherwise.

† For these elaborate classifications of jus, see p. 291.

64. A. L. von Schlozer treats the relation of the Ruler and the People as entirely a contractual relation (pp 95sqq), which should ideally be defined in a fundamental contract made under oath (p 102, §6), but he allows the Ruler the right to denounce the contract at any time, and he gives the People the right of denouncing it under given conditions (p 108, §10). Though he rejects the theory that 'law should be the one and only Ruler', and though he emphasises strongly the necessity of a 'Sovereign' or 'Ruler' who constitutes the common will, and represents the State, either as an 'individuum' or as an 'unum morale fringed by a majority' (pp 77-9, 95, 100), he none the less imposes fixed limits upon the power of this sovereign in the course of his argument (cf p 94, §1)—contending that he is bound by positive as well as by natural law (p 96, §2, p. 101, §6), and that he is subject to the fundamental contract (p. 102).

65. Daries, e.g., regards the withholding of justice as causing a return to the state of nature (§733). Achenwall allows individuals only the right to emigrate, when the fundamental contract is broken; but he allows a universitas, or an insurgens pars populi, the right to resist by force of arms and expel the tyrant, if the danger threatened by acquiescence in wrong is greater than the disadvantages of rebellion, §§200-7 [cf. Bentham's Fragment of Government, where resistance is held to be 'allowable to, if not incumbent on, every man when the probable mischiefs of resistance (speaking with respect to the community in general) appear less to him than the probable mischiefs of submission' (c. iv, §xxi), cf also Palcy's Moral and Political Philosophy (Book vi, c. iii)—'the justice of resistance is reduced to a computation of the quantity of the danger and grievance on the one side, and of the probability and expense of redressing it on the other']

Scheidemantel thinks the nation entitled, if there be real tyranny, to rise in forcible resistance, on the ground that the bond between the prince and the nation is broken by abuse of the power of the State and transgression of the limits of that power, and that the nation thus returns to the liberty and equality of the state of nature (iii, pp. 364-75).

Schlözer allows a droit de résistance if there be evident tyranny, along with a power of enforcing that right by coercion, deposition or punishment, 'all being in accordance with the notion of a contract in general'. But he does not think the individual justified in exercising, or the masses capable of using, this right 'woe, therefore, to the State where there are no representatives, and happy Germany—the only land in the world where a man can take action against his ruler, without prejudice to his dignity, by due process of law, and before an external tribunal' (pp 105-7) [Schlozer, writing in 1793, is thinking of the Reichskammergericht at Wetzlar, dissolved, along with the Reich itself, in 1806].

The reader is also referred to the author's work on Althusius, p 315 n 128.

66. Discourses, iii, sect 44. The power of parliament is 'essentially and radically in the people, from whom their delegates and representatives have all that they have'. In England, however, unlike Switzerland and the Netherlands, the several counties and towns are not separate sovereign bodies, but only 'members of that great body which comprehends the whole nation', and therefore the representatives do not serve the bodies by which they are elected, but the whole nation. If these representatives could assemble of themselves [i.e. without a royal summons—a summons which, at the time when Sidney was writing (1680-3), Charles II steadily refused to constitutional-list theory

Schlözer's

Theories of resistance

Sidney on parliaments

issue], they would be responsible to the nation, and the nation only when it is impossible for them to assemble, they have only a responsibility to their consciences and to public opinion. But this great power of the representatives, instead of diminishing liberty, really maintains it. It is identical, at bottom, with the power of the electorate. The people still remains sovereign, because only the possessor of an unlimited right can give an unlimited power of representation. The reason for the people giving such power, instead of imposing 'instructions' or mandates, is simply a prudent self-restraint [Sidney's argument, in favour of true 'national' representation and against 'instructions', is a harbinger of Burke's famous speech to the Bristol electors in 1774 (Works, in Bohn's edition, vol. 1, p. 447, cf. a similar passage in his Reflections, vol. II, p. 457). Mr Norton, a member of one of Elizabeth's parliaments, had already argued in 1571 that in parliamentary representation 'the whole body of the realm, and the service of the same, was rather to be respected than any private regard of place or person' (Hallam, Con. Hist. 1, c. v, p. 267).]

67 Discourses, II, sects 7, 32 (on solemn, sworn and binding contracts between the magistrates and the nation)

68 The People, Sidney argues, is the source of all authority (I, s. 20), it creates authority (II, s. 6), and it determines its limits (II, ss. 7, 30-33), it necessarily retains legislative power, even in a monarchy (III, ss. 13-14, 45-6), and it continues to be a judge above all the magistrates (III, s. 41). The ruler is an officer appointed by and responsible to the people (II, s. 3, III, ss. 1sqq.) no obedience is due to his commands if they are unjust (III, ss. 11, 20) resistance is permissible, if he abuses his office (III, ss. 4sqq.), and he may even be deposed (III, s. 41, cf. s. 36—'the general revolt of a nation cannot be called a rebellion'), the people too [as well as parliament] thus retains the right of free assembly (III, ss. 31, 38).

69 Cf. Locke's Second Treatise, II, c. 10, §132, cc. 13-14. The people (or 'the community') continues to be the fountain of all powers, and retains a right of reversion therein (II, c. 11, §141, c. 19, §§220 and 243), but its 'supreme power' only expresses itself in the event of the dissolution or forfeiture of authority (II, c. 13, §149), and the legislative power is sovereign 'whilst the government subsists' (II, c. 13, §150). [Locke goes further than Gierke allows in his view of the rights of the People. In c. 10, §132, anticipating Rousseau, he argues that 'the majority, having the whole power of the community naturally in them, may employ all that power in making laws for the community from time to time, and executing those laws by officers of their own appointing, and then the form of government is a perfect democracy.' Normally, we must admit, Locke regards the people as delegating its power to a 'legislative', rather than as making laws itself. Even so, as we have already had reason to notice (supra, n. 68 to §16), he does not speak of a contract between people and legislative, but of a unilateral act of the people vesting a trustee or 'fiduciary' power in the legislative. It follows upon this view that, while this fiduciary legislative may be called 'supreme', or even 'the one supreme power', the people is always a super-sovereign, having another and higher 'supreme power to remove or alter the legislative when they find the legislative act contrary to the trust reposed in them'. Thus the people comes into action, not in the presumably rare event of a breach of contract, but in the presumably more frequent event of 'action contrary to the trust'. For such an event, to judge from the analogy of the

Sidney on
the People

Locke on the rights of
the People

treatment of the trustee in English Privaatrecht, may be confidently expected by the trustor who is also the beneficiary of the trust—all the more as he is in addition (in Locke's theory of the political trust) the judge of its execution.]

70. The people is the sovereign judge which decides whether the powers appointed by it, including the legislative power, observe their limits. If a formal organisation of its rights is lacking, it can appeal to Heaven if it has once removed the powers which have forfeited their authority, it can either content itself by simply placing authority in fresh hands, or erect an entirely new constitution [Locke actually says, in c. 10, § 132, where he is speaking of legislative power which has been given for lives, or for any limited time, that upon reversion 'the community may dispose of it again anew into what hands they please, and so (not 'or') constitute a new form of government' (The references which Gierke gives are to c. 19, esp. §§ 212, 220, 242-3, and to c. 18, §§ 199-210, but they do not support his account of Locke's views.) Nor does Gierke's phrase about the people 'appealing to Heaven if a formal organisation of its rights is lacking' correspond to what Locke actually says (c. 19, § 242). There is nothing in Locke about absence of formal organisation of rights for him the community is 'presently incorporate' by the original contract of society, continues to remain in that condition, and is thus formally organised for vindicating its rights. Again, the 'appeal to Heaven' means something more definite, and more legal, than Gierke's brief quotation suggests. Locke is arguing that if a controversy arises between the prince and some of the people on a matter on which law is silent or doubtful, the proper umpire is the body of the people, who have given him his power as a trust and can therefore decide upon his use or abuse of that power. If the prince, however, declines that way of determination, 'the appeal then lies nowhere but to Heaven'—i.e. the case is carried in the last resort to the divine ordeal of battle in civil war.]

71. Cf. supra, p. 108

72. Contr. Soc. II, cc. 1-2, 7, III, cc. 15-16, cf. supra, p. 112

73. On sovereignty as inalienable, see Contr. Soc. II, c. 1. Sovereignty, Rousseau on sovereignty being nothing but the exercise of the general will, is inalienable. A contract of subjection [pacte de gouvernement] would mean the dissolution of the people—il perd sa qualité de peuple. Will simply cannot be 'transferred', the sovereign may say, 'I do will what such and such a person wills', but not, 'I shall will whatever such and such a person may will to-morrow'.

On the indivisibility of sovereignty, see II, cc. 6-7. The people is the only legislator it needs to be instructed by an enlightened law-giver, because it is not always able to see the good which it always wills, but the law-giver has only the office of proposing and drafting—le peuple même ne peut, quand il le voudrait, se déposséder de ce droit incommuniqué.

On sovereignty as illimitable, cf. III, c. 16. A contract between people and king is inconceivable sovereignty is illimitable as well as inalienable. la limiter c'est la détruire il n'y a qu'un contrat dans l'état, c'est celui d'association, et celui-ci seul exclut tout autre, on ne saurait imaginer aucun contrat public, qui ne fût une violation du premier

On the impossibility of representation, see III, c. 15

74. Government is a commission un emploi dans lequel, simples officiers du Souverain, ils exercent dans son nom le pouvoir dont il les a faits dépositaires, et qu'il peut limiter, modifier ou reprendre quand il lui plaît, l'aliénation d'un tel droit étant incompatible avec la nature du corps social et contrarie au but de l'association (III, c. 1).

Locke on the People as sovereign judge

Rousseau on sovereignty

On Government

The 'institution of the government' is not a contract, but a twofold act—the passing of a law in regard to the future form of administration, and the putting of this law into effect. The fact that the political body can thus achieve an administrative act [i.e. the act of putting the law into effect] before the existence of an administration is explained by this body's astonishing conjunction of apparently contradictory properties [or, as Rousseau puts it, 'by one of those astonishing properties—by which it is able to unite operations which seem to be contradictory'] it executes its own law par une conversion subite de Souveraineté en Démocratie—that is to say, by simply instituting une nouvelle relation de tous à tous [in which, for the nonce, the citizens become magistrates], as when the English House of Commons turns itself into a committee of the whole House (iii, c. 17)

75 Contr. soc. iii, cc. 11-14, 18, cf. supra, n. 209 to § 16

76 Ibid. iii, c. 14. À l'instant que le Peuple est légitimement assemblé en Corps Souverain, toute juridiction du Gouvernement cesse, la puissance exécutive est suspendue et la personne du dernier Citoyen est aussi sacrée et inviolable que celle du premier Magistrat, parce qu'où se trouve le Représenté, il n'y a plus du Représentant. Cf. also iii, c. 18 every constitution is only provisional, and all offices are revocable regular assemblies are required, each of which must open with the putting of two questions (1) s'il plait au Souverain de conserver la présente forme du Gouvernement? (2) s'il plait au Peuple d'en laisser l'administration à ceux qui en sont actuellement chargés?

77 Contr. soc. i, cc. 6-7, ii, cc. 2, 4

78 Ibid. iii, cc. 1-6, 16-17, supra, nn. 213 and 214 to § 16 Rousseau, of course, is not blind to the contradiction between his own theory and the actual facts of contemporary constitutional law, but he treats all existing conditions as illegal, and without any binding force. According to his theory the moment at which this second moral person [that of the Gouvernement] assumes the independent ruling authority which it is capable of exercising, and tends to exercise, marks the violation of the traité social, the dissolution of le grand État, and the constitution of a new State, composed of the governors only, and excluding the citizens, who thus revert to the liberty of the state of nature, and are not obliged, though they may perhaps be compelled, to render obedience (iii, c. 10)

79. In the theory of Sicyès, for example, the person of the State is simply the community of associated individuals (cf. n. 117 to § 16), and this community, in virtue of its inalienable and illimitable sovereignty, cannot be bound either by a fundamental constitution or by law on the contrary, it can abolish all positive law whenever it wishes, in the strength of the community-will which is the final source and supreme controller of such law, and it can create new law by the simple expression of such will (i, pp. 131-6, 143, 202sqq.) But this omnipotence of the collective sovereign only appears in action when the nation uses its supreme right in a controversy about the basic constitution, and proceeds to form a constituent assembly by appointing extraordinary and plenipotentiary representatives (i, pp. 138-42). On the other hand, even in ordinary times, when there is no such assembly in session, the law which the nation itself has enacted controls the corps constitué, including the legislative no less than the executive, as a universally binding constitutional norm (i, pp. 127-37, ii, pp. 363sqq., cf. also nn. 118 and 119 to § 16, supra). Cf. also Filangieri, i, cc. 1, 11, vn, c. 53.

*On the provisional character
of the constitution*

The dualism implicit in Rousseau's theory

Sicyès' modification of Rousseau's views

80 Fichte lays considerable emphasis on the rule of law. In order to secure it, he postulates a government which, though it is responsible to the sovereign people, has its own independent basis, and he rejects as 'illegal' forms both democracy proper, in which the community is judge and plaintiff at the same time, and despotisms in which the government is irresponsible (Works, iii, pp. 125sqq., 1504sqq.)

81 Works, iii, pp. 1505sqq., 160-3, 286sqq.

82. Ibid iii, pp. 155sqq., 163, 166sqq.

83. Ibid iii, p. 169. So long as the appointed ruling authority lasts, its will is the common will, and any other will is a private will.

84 Ibid iii, p. 170.

85 Ibid iii, pp. 171sqq.

86 Ibid iii, p. 173. Fichte is not thinking here of a single large popular assembly, but of assemblies in different places, which must, however, be 'really great masses'. Such 'great masses' are necessary, in order that the force of the people may be unquestionably superior to that of executive officers (p. 177).

87 Ibid iii, pp. 182sqq. The people is never a rebel, for what is greater than the people? Only God. The leaders of popular movements are presumptively rebels, but the presumption is cancelled as soon as the people follows them, and thus declares them to be in agreement with the real general will. See, to the same effect Fichte's Sittenlehre (ol. 1798), in Works, iv, pp. 238sqq.

88 Fichte speaks expressly of a 'contract of devolution', arguing that in the making of that contract the magistrates negotiate with the people as a 'party' to it, and are excluded from membership of the people in perpetuity by accepting its terms. Once they have accepted these terms, and made themselves responsible, they can neither resign their office, nor be deprived of it, except by the common consent of both parties, and they must be given a free sphere of action in promoting the general good (Works, iii, pp. 163-5, 175-7).

89. Works, iii, p. 176.

90 Once the assembled people re-enters upon its sovereignty, as 'the Community', the magistrates become merely a 'party' the ephors appear as accusers, and the executive officers as defendants (condemnation involves the penalties of high treason and perpetual banishment, but acquittal restores the person or persons acquitted to the position of 'magistrate') (Works, iii, pp. 174sqq.)

91 In his lectures on Die Grundzüge des gegenwärtigen Zeitalters (1804-5), Fichte detaches the State from its individual members (cf. n. 66 to § 16). It is now described as 'a notion invisible in its essence' it is 'not individuals, but their continuous relation towards one another—a relation of which the living and moving author is the activity of individuals, as they exist in space' again it is 'the result' which emerges from the union of the leadership of the governors with the strength of the governed when they follow that leadership (Works, vii, pp. 146-8). In his Rechtslehre also [1812] he adopts throughout an impersonal view of the State, ascribing sovereignty to 'the emergent will for law and right' which is manifested in the Ruler (Posthumous Works, ii, p. 629, cf. Works, viii, p. 157). A similar view appears in the Staatslehre [1813], where supreme authority is vindicated 'for the highest human reason of a given age and nation' (Works, iv, pp. 444sqq.).

Fichte
on the rule of law

Fichte on meetings of the community

On popular resistance

On the contract of devolution

On the magistrates and the community

Fichte's later philosophy

92 Esprit des lois, xi, c. 6 legislative power inherently belongs to le Peuple en corps comme dans un État libre tout homme qui est censé avoir une âme libre doit être gouverné par lui-même

Montesquieu avoids the problem of
sovereignty

93. In dealing with the theory of separation of powers (xi, c. 6), Montesquieu avoids entirely any treatment of the problem of sovereignty. In dealing with the classification of States, he speaks of the souveraine puissance of the Peuple en corps in democracies (ii, c. 2), but so far as other forms of State are concerned he only speaks of 'government' by a minority or a single person (ii, cc. 3-5)—though he occasionally describes a king as Souverain (e.g. vi, c. 5). He never makes any reference whatever to the personality of the State the issue to which his attention is always directed is whether the three sorites de Pouvoir should be united in a single man or body of men, or divided between several

Frederick the Great and
the People

94. Frederick the Great indubitably comes very near to a theoretical recognition of the sovereignty of the people. Not only does he refer the origin of all ruling authority to a contractual act of devolution by the people he also identifies 'People' and 'State', in contradistinction to the Ruler appointed in virtue of that contractual act, and his famous saying that the Prince is le premier serviteur de l'État also reappears in his writings in the form that he is le premier domestique des peuples qui sont sous sa domination (Antimach c. 1, Oeuvres, 1, p. 123, VIII, pp. 25sqq, ix, pp. 196-7) [Gierke naturally seeks to cite the great authority of Frederick the Great. But it is not clear that Frederick was doing anything except to repeat, in a literary exercise, the current maxims of the Age of Enlightenment, nor is it certain whether, in identifying People and State, he meant (1) that the State is only the People, or (2) that the People is only the State—two seemingly identical propositions which are none the less very different] The reader is also referred to the expressions of the constitutionalist theory in Voltaire, de Mably, Blackstone, de Lolme, etc., cf. the author's work on Althusius, p. 187 n. 186

Justi on
popular
rights

95. Justi regards the State as a single moral body, with a joint force and a single will (Natur und Wesen, §28). In this body, it is 'the basic authority of the people' which is the source of all other authority and is constantly appearing in action itself—determining the fundamental laws of the State, and limiting and binding the ruling authority which it confers (§46). Only the 'use' of the common possessions and powers is devolved upon the Ruler the dominium eminens (Obereigentum) in respect of them all remains with 'the People', or 'the whole State', of which the Ruler is the 'Representative' (§49). The bearer of ruling authority cannot, therefore, use his authority for purposes repugnant to its final cause, or damage its substance (§50), and if he attempts to do so, the people may revoke the commission which it gave (§47). If the Ruler cannot fulfil his commission, or if he violates the fundamental contract, his rights disappear (§§141-2, 146, 161). He must always 'have in view the united will of the people' (§§149-50) the basic authority of the people affords a presumption in favour of 'a limited ruling authority' (§57), but even where the Ruler is unlimited this basic authority of the people still remains in force (§§67, 74). See also Justi's Grundrisz, §§9, 11, 15, 17, 23sqq, 29sqq

Dualism
of People and Ruler
in his theory

96. The 'supreme active authority', once it has been appointed, is independent, and not subject to the judicial cognisance of the people, because the people is pacifcans [i.e. a party to a contract in which it has stipulated certain conditions in its own favour] and cannot be judge in its own case

(Natur und Wesen, §67) While the supreme authority observes the limits of the fundamental laws, it has the use of the whole power of the body politie, and thereby also of the powers and possessions of its individual members (§§45, 48) the Ruler and the People are the two main parts of this body, connected together by the closest of ties, which can only be broken by a definite breach of contract (§§128, 130-42)

97. Natur und Wesen, §§93sqq, 130-42

98. The people is the source of all authority, and moreover, in the Kant's theory of popular rights rational and only lawful and definitive State (which Kant calls the Republik), it is also the 'Sovereign',asmuch as true sovereignty or ruling authority belongs to the legislative, and the agreed will of the people should be the legislative (Works, vi, pp. 227sqq, viii, pp. 131sqq, §§45-6) The associated people itself thus emerges, by virtue of the political contract by which it is constituted, as 'the universal Head' (vii, p. 133, §47) 'The Regent (rex or principes), as being the moral or physical person entrusted with executive authority, is to be regarded as the 'agent' of the people, or 'the organ of the Ruler' [i.e. of the true Ruler—the people itself] He is 'subject to the rule of law, and bound thereby, and therefore he is bound by another than himself, that is to say, by the Sovereign', who can 'take away his authority, depose him, or reform his administration' (vii, pp. 134-5, §49, p. 137, vi, pp. 332, 336) Similarly the people is the fountain of justice—though it has to exercise the right of judicial decision indirectly, through representatives chosen from and by itself (the Jury),* and, further, to leave execution to the courts of justice (vii, p. 135) Being 'the most personal of all forms of Right', the sovereignty of the People is inalienable, any contract, by which the people pledges itself to return the sovereignty it has once attained [by concluding the original political contract, which ipso facto constituted the political body so created sovereign over itself], is 'inherently null and void', and if any man exercises the power of sovereignty as a legislator, 'he can only have control over the people through the common will of the people, but he cannot have control over the common will itself' (vii, p. 159, §54)

99. Cf. Works, vi, pp. 329-30 'an idea of the reason—that is to say, an idea such as to oblige every ruler, in enacting law, to enact it as though it could have proceeded from the will of the whole people, and, again, to oblige every subject, so far forth as he wishes to be a real citizen, to regard the law as though he had concurred in the will enacting it in the manner aforesaid this is the touchstone of the rightfulness of all public law' (1 also viii, p. 158 [We may almost say that Kant's philosophy is a philosophy of the as though (als ob), in the sense that when a thing is done 'as though' it were another thing (e.g. when law is enacted by somebody other than the people 'as though' it were enacted by the people), it becomes that other thing 'The real difficulty which Kant is facing is whether a law for the general good can be enacted otherwise than by the general will He answers that it can be—provided that the enactor enacts 'as though' he were the general will. We might rejoin that no man or body of men other than the general will can act as the general will acts—i.e. can have gone through the dialectical process of social discussion, and taken the broad general social view, which a whole society can go through and take.]

* Kant's view appears to go beyond English practice, where the jury finds the facts on which the judicial decision is based. His distinction between the Rechtsprechung of the jury and the Ausführung by the Gerichtshof corresponds to old Teutonic ideas and practices, in which the people assembled in a folk-moot judge, and a judicial officer (such as the sheriff) executes the judgment, but it does not correspond to the relations between judge and jury in England, where the jury is in no way analogous to a folk-moot, but is derived from a royal prerogative method of 'inquisition' into the facts, through 'sworn' representatives of local knowledge and opinion picked by royal officials, leading to a decision given by a royal judge.

Kant not a democrat in practice

100 The people cannot 'ratiocinate effectively' about the origin of the supreme authority to which it is subject, and it must 'obey the de facto legislative authority, be its origin what it may'. It 'cannot, and must not, judge otherwise than as the Head of the State for the time being (summus imperans) may will'. The Head of the State alone is exempt from all coercive law. He is 'not a member, but the author and sustainer of the commonwealth', the one and only 'gracious sovereign Lord' in the State, and although there are norms or standards which the Ruler should observe in enacting laws, any and every law is binding on his subjects. It follows that the people can never enjoy a right of resisting the powers that be (it cannot even plead that right in case of necessity), or possess any authority to coerce or punish the Head of the State, nor can any constitutional provision be conceived, or admitted, by which a 'publicly constituted opposition' can be invoked to protect the rights of the people against the Head of the State in the event of his violation of the constitution, since any such authority would itself be the Head of the State, or would postulate the existence of a third Head of the State [to judge between it and the summus imperans]. True, there are 'indestructible rights of the people as against the Head of the State', but the only protection of such rights is 'liberty of the pen, the one palladium of popular rights'. See Works, vi, pp. 323, 326 and 330-7, 449-50, vii, pp. 136-41, 158sqq.

On this basis Kant also rejects the possibility of any alteration of the constitution by the people, and contents himself by appealing to 'the powers that be' to observe the law of Reason which requires that they should realise a constitutional system of government and thus create the only rightful and abiding constitution, Works, vii, pp. 157sqq.

101 It is true that Kant believes that the 'associated people', in a constitutional State of this pattern, should not only represent the Sovereign [in the sense of representing the final and sovereign law of Reason], but should actually be sovereign itself, in the sense of exercising legislative authority through the deputies whom it elects, but since it cannot, in its capacity of legislative, enjoy any executive powers, or pronounce any judicial decision, the people is left completely impotent as against the other powers, Works, vi, pp. 416-20, vii, pp. 131-6, 159-60.

102. Cf. Works, vii, pp. 158-9, §52 'this is the only permanent constitution of the State, in which law is self-governing and depends on no special person'. Cf. also pp. 156 and 173.

103 Cf. nn. 41 and 47 to §14.

104. Thus Horn argues that there cannot be a mixta Respublica, because majestas is no more divisible or communicable than intellectus Petri cani communicari potest. Any division of the rights of supreme authority means a complete confusion and destruction of majestas even in Poland (as was also the case in Scotland at an earlier date) the King is still the Sovereign, although his modus habendi majestatem is limitatus by the pact which obliges him to consult the proceres. De cui iii, c. un. §3, and ii, c. 2, §8, c. 10, §5, cf. Beermann, c. 24, §6.

*'Mixed'
and 'limited'
States*

105. Cf. Micraelius, i, c. 13, §§33sqq. there is a forma mixta, but it only exists in the sense of a forma temperata, and this designation is preferable. Similarly Knichen, after giving an exhaustive account of the position of the controversy, arrives at the view that it is best to avoid the conception of a forma mixta, because the question is really one of limitata (rather than of mixta) summa potestas (Opus pol. i, c. 8, th. 8, pp. 318-22).

Fénelon also, while he rejects equally despotisme des Souverains et de la Population, regards a forma mixta as impracticable, because it involves partage de la Souveraineté (c. xii), and he describes, with an obvious prepossession in its favour, a system of monarchie modérée par l'aristocratie, in which the King needs the consent of an aristocratic chamber for legislation, and that of the people itself for the imposition of new taxes (c. xv).

106. If this line was taken [i.e. if it was argued that limited sovereignty was inconceivable, and that States with constitutional limitations upon the rights of the Ruler were only 'mixed', and not pure, formis], the result, on the basis adopted by Bodin and Hobbes and other advocates of absolutism, was simply to demonstrate the non-existence of such States, for on their view the real sovereign must always be either one man, or a single aristocratic council, or the people itself as a single unit, and no constitutional limits were legally binding upon that sovereign.

Arnaiseus, on the other hand, though he regards any limitation of sovereignty as inconceivable, admits the possibility of its division (cf. n. 47 to § 14). Spinoza too sketches the ideal of a limited monarchy, although he considers absolute monarchy alone to be real monarchy (cf. Tract pol. c. 6-7, and supra, n. 10 to § 17).

107. Pufendorf Jur. nat. et gent. vii, cc. 4, 5, §§12-15, c. 6, §13, De off. hom. et civ. cc. 7, 8, §12.

108. Thomasius, Instit. iur. div. iii, c. 6, §§32-3, 38-56, 59-61, 156-60.

109. J. H. Boehmer, Jus publ. univ. i, c. 3, §§25-6. the mixtus status, when it occurs, is in any case a monstrum Republicae, because it depends on a division of powers, and such division disturbs uno.

110. Hert, Elem. i, 11, §8.

111. Schmier, Jus publ. univ. i, c. 4, nos. 30-55. a genuine forma mixta, when it occurs, is necessarily informis, because majestas is indivisible. [and to divide it therefore destroys the forma Republicae and makes it informis] All that is compatible with the essence of the State is (1) 'limitation' of majesty in regard to its modus habendi and (2) the participation of others in its administratio.

112. Gundling, Jus nat. c. 37, §§21-36, Disc. c. 36. Any res publica is Gundling on the mixed State 'irregular', when the 'Subject' of majesty is several different persons, and not una persona physica vel moralis, and when majesty is therefore divided, and the State is without unity and a soul or spirit. Th. H. is nothing, therefore, in a res publica mixta, and Sidney's view is a mere chimera, but people may all the same live happily in such a State, per accidens, as they do in England, Germany and Poland. Cf. Jus nat. c. 38, §§19-23, where Gundling argues that the people may draw the sword in a 'limited and irregular form of State', in which tuetur unusquisque jus suum ex pactis quae sunt, but it is otherwise, he adds, in a regular form of State.

113. Heiniccius, Elementa, ii, §138.

114. Heincke, Syst. i, c. 3, §§24-5 (note the sharp distinction, in §26, between the mixed constitution and the forma temperata).

'Irregular' States

115 We find Hert, for example (loc. cit.), already developing [in his Elements of 1689] a formal scheme of res publicas irregulares which includes five subdivisions—Despotisms, Patrimonial States, Vassal States, and Unions or Confederations, in addition to Mixed States. Schmier (i, c. 4, ss. 1-3 of his Jus publ. univ. of 1722) distinguishes three kinds of irregular civitates—ex defectu finis, ex defectu formae, ex defectu nexus. Cf. also Gundling [in 1714], n. 112 of this section.

116 Otto's Commentaries on Pufendorf, § 12 on De off. hom. et civ. n. c. 8

117 Titius, Spec. iur. publ. vn, c. 7, §§ 31-3 and 53-63. In the civitas laxa, we have to ascribe majestas pluribus simili saltem obligatione connexis diuisum vel indivisum, but even in such a case the State is one, and the 'Subject' of political authority is unum, sed non satis unum.

Theories of partnership in sovereignty

118 See Besold, Diss. de statu Rep. mixta, c. 1 (where the phrase communica majestatica potestas occurs), cf. also the author's work on Althusius, pp. 169 n. 138, 181 n. 170, 355 nn. 77 and 78. In using the argument that the Emperor and the Estates of Germany were only coniunctum [and not severally or separately] the 'Subject' of a single and indivisible sovereignty, thinkers were especially concerned to rebut the attacks of Hippolitus a Lapide and Pufendorf on the prevalent theory, and to vindicate the constitution of the Empire from any taint of irregularity.

119. Huber, De iure civ. 1, 3, c. 1, §§ 21-3, c. 5, §§ 24-5qq., 79-80, 1, 8, c. 6. Such communities [in which sovereignty is shared] may arise in consequence of the rights of majesty being either alienated or prescriptively acquired by one of the three parties concerned—prince, nobles and people, 1, 3, c. 89. While there is no possibility of applying legal coercion to a Sovereign, the application of such coercion to the Imperans is a conceivable thing when the people in societatem imperii, saltem pro parte, receptus est, 1, 9, c. 5, § 49.

120 For attempts to defend the mixed form of State by the doctrine of partnership in sovereignty see e.g. Cellarius, c. 9, § 35 (coniunctum sumptu), Kestner, c. 7, §§ 5 and 8 (in solidum), Alberti, c. 14, § 11, H. de Cocceji, Prodomus (a different view appears in S. de Cocceji, § 624), Heineccius, II, § 126, and especially Scheidemantel (i, pp. 156-62). Scheidemantel—agreeing with Pufendorf, Real, Mercier and Rousseau, as against Grotius, Arnaeaus, Piccartus, Montesquieu, Mably and Justi—attacks any division of the rights of majesty as an offence against the unity of the State, describing the appearance of such division as 'a disease', but he admits the possibility of a partnership in majesty, i.e. a participation of several 'Subjects' in the exercise of its rights.

121. Thinkers, as a rule, were shy of treating in any detail this problem of the nature of the shares [possessed by the different 'Subjects' of majesty], contenting themselves with such phrases as were suitable for describing the legal position of ownership by gesamte Hand in German law [cf. supra, p. 185, n. *]. There were some who assumed, in respect of systems of joint majesty, a condominium plurium in solidum analogous to the condominium of private-law groups, cf. Kestner, loc. cit., and especially Vitruvius (i, 7, §§ 4-6), who speaks of a single Right with 'Subjects' who are 'diverse and mixed', parallel to the obligation of corre debendi [where there are multiple debtors, but a single 'Object' owed by them all, cf. supra, p. 123, n. *]. There were others who spoke of 'ideal' shares of Besold, loc. cit., and Frantzen, Diss. de statu Rep. mixtae (in Arumaeus, III, no. 27).

122 Thus we find Hulderic ab Eyben arguing—in his De sede Majestatis Romano-Germanicae (Scripta, iii, no. 5), c. 1, §§31sqq—that in a mixed form of State several ‘Subjects’ together form the ‘common Subject’ (muscetur non majestas, sed subjectum), but he proceeds to add that the exercise of supreme authority [i.e. the actual use of majesty, as distinct from majesty ‘in itself’ when regarded as an abstract power] may be either (1) divided among several users, or (2) managed on a joint system in some respects, but divided in others (§37)—the latter being the case in Germany, in so far as the authority of the territorial princes is really a case of the distribution of imperial sovereignty among different persons for separate use (c. 3) [i.e. in Germany imperial sovereignty is in some respects managed on a joint system, in which the Emperor and the Estates are associated, but in other respects it is divided among territorial princes]

123 Achenwall, II, §§186–7

124. Like Arnsacius, Grotius, Linnæus, and other thinkers of previous centuries, we find Clasen (n, c. 9), Felwinger (Diss. de Rep. mixta, pp. 417sqq.), and Boecler (n, c. 2, iii, cc. 1, 8), still maintaining the conception of a forma mixta with a real divisio majestatis

125. Thus Treuer, in commenting on Pufendorf, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 7, §9, contends that majestatis divisio is generally possible and advantageous, and does not produce a monstrum, because res publica perpetuum majestatis subjectione manet

126 Leibniz (Spec. demonstr. polit. prop. 16, p. 537) argues that in dealing with the jus majestatis, as in dealing with any jus, we have to draw a distinction between ipsa ius et potestas and exercitum. On this basis we can explain mixturas formarum. Poland is a democracy if we look at the ius, but a monarchy if we look at the exercitum summae potestatis

127. On the beginning of the theory that the three ‘powers’ should necessarily be divided—a theory which may already be traced in Buchanan and Hooker and Sidney—see the author’s work on Althusius, pp. 157 n. 102, 163 n. 119, 355 n. 79. Sidney regards a ‘mixed or popular government’, combining all the three forms of State, as the best (c. II, ss. 8–29), but he does not definitely bring the idea of division of powers into connection with this doctrine. Locke also does not examine the relation of the system of division of powers, which he postulates in II, cc. 12–14 and 19, to the mixture of the different forms of which he speaks in II, c. 10, §192. [Gierke is here reading too much into Locke. The passages cited (II, cc. 12–14 and 19) do not warrant the view that Locke postulates a system of division of powers—at any rate so far as their exercise is concerned. He simply seeks to distinguish, in thought, between the different functions of political authority. He is dealing with the logical analysis of functions, rather than with the practical question of separation (or union) of the organs which exercise functions. Distinguishing three functions, he only remarks (1) that in practice ‘the legislative and executive powers come often to be separated’, because the former is not always in session, while the latter is always in action, and (2) that the executive and federative powers are ‘really distinct in themselves’ (the one dealing with internal administration, and the other with treaty-making and foreign policy), but ‘are almost always united’ in exercise (II, c. 12, §§144, 147). This implies a distinction between a legislative organ which is not always in session, and a joint executive-federative organ which is always in action, but it is a distinction merely based on continuity or dis-

The ‘shares’
in the partnership

Leibniz
on the mixed
State

Division of powers

Locke’s theory of the three powers]

continuity of operation, and Locke's theory of the 'supreme power' of the legislative (subject always to the over-sovereignty of the community itself) is a theory which does not square with the idea of a separation of powers as necessary to liberty. On the whole, Locke believes in a united or single sovereignty, which is immediately vested in the legislative, and ultimately in the community—though he admits that where 'the executive is vested in a single person who has also a share in the legislative, there that single person, in a very tolerable sense, may also be called supreme'. But this is a guarded phrase, extorted by English conditions, and immediately qualified and modified (n, c 13, § 151), and Locke also hastens to add that 'the executive power placed anywhere but in a person that has also a share in the legislative is visibly subordinate and accountable to it' (§ 152)]

128. Esprit des lois, XI, cc. 2, 4, 6, VI, cc. 5-6

129. Ibid. XI, cc. 4, 6. But Montesquieu is in favour of as much division of powers as possible even in simple forms of State, and he deals with the way in which it may be achieved under different constitutions, XI, cc. 7-30

130. Montesquieu goes to the length of declaring that a constitution, in which le peuple en corps can draw all the powers into its own hands, is the greatest menace to liberty XI, cc. 5, 6. In a proper State not only the judicial, but also the executive power is independent of the popular assembly or the assembly of popular representatives le pouvoir arrête le pouvoir, and the three powers can impede one another in moving, mais comme par le mouvement nécessaire des choses elles seront contraintes d'aller, elles seront forcées d'aller de concert, XI, cc. 4, 6

131. Contr. soc. III, c. 2

132. Ibid. III, cc. 4, 7. It depends on circumstances whether the gouvernement mixte is to be preferred to the gouvernement simple. Strictly speaking, there is hardly such a thing as a gouvernement simple

133. Ibid. n, c. 2. Whether we look at the 'Subject' owning, or the 'Object' owned, Sovereignty is indivisible. Political theorists behave like Japanese jugglers, who cut a child into pieces, throw the pieces up into the air, and make a living child come down, telz sont à peu près le tourz de gobelet de nos politiques, après avoir démembré le corps social, par un prestige digne de la foire ils rassemblent les pièces on ne sait comment

134. Ibid. III, c. 1. Just as all voluntary action has two causes which must both be operative, volonté and pouissance, so, in the body politic, there must necessarily be a distinction between volonté and force, or in other words between pouissance législative and pouissance exécutive, and while the former of these must belong to the sovereign body, it need not necessarily possess the latter

135. See n. 74 to this section, cf. also Contr. soc. II, c. 6 and III, c. 1, where the argument is pressed that legislation, being the only possible expression of the general will on general objects, is the only possible activity of the Sovereign when acting as such, while political activity of any other kind, being action particulière, is merely an action de magistrature, even when the Sovereign itself undertakes that activity [See n. 74 supra, on the sovereign community turning itself into a democracy, and the citizens making themselves magistrates, for purposes of executive action]

136. Cf. supra, n. 78 to this section.

137. Such an approach to the principle of division of powers appears in Sieyès, I, pp. 283sqq., 445sqq., II, pp. 363sqq., 371sqq. and 376sqq. Here division of powers is justified by the argument that though there is only one political authority—that of the social body itself—there are different organs of that authority, based on different commissions given by the society. Sieyès also attempts to argue for a system of concours of powers, instead of a balance or equilibrium.

See also Fichte's Naturrecht, I, pp. 193sqq (Works, III, pp. 161sqq). Fichte, however, subsequently rejected the idea of division of powers in his Rechtslehre (Posthumous Works, II, p. 632).

138 This combination of the mixed constitution and division of powers appears in Blackstone, Commentaries (1765), I, c. 2sqq, in de Lolme, The Constitution of England (1775, first published in French in 1771), in the Abbé de Mably, Deuxes proposés aux philosophes économistes sur l'ordre naturel et essentiel des sociétés politiques (1768), Lettre x, and De la législation ou des Principes des lois (1776), III, c. 3, and in other writers. [Among other writers who combine the mixed constitution and division of powers may be mentioned Paley, who in his Principles of Moral and Political Philosophy (1785), Book VI, c. 7, argues (1) that the British constitution is formed by 'a combination of the three regular species of government', and (2) that the security of the constitution depends on a 'balance of the constitution', or 'political equilibrium', securing each part of the legislative—King, Lords and Commons—from the encroachments of the other parts in the exercise of the powers assigned to it.] The balance, Paley argues, is double: it is both a balance of power, and a balance of interest. Paley differs from the general continental usage in speaking of a balance or equilibrium, not of the three powers (legislative, judicature and executive), but of the three parts of the legislative. This was natural in England, where the legislative, or King in Parliament, was regarded as everything, so that any parts or divisions must necessarily be parts of it. It is this point of view which enables Paley to identify the mixed constitution with division or balance of powers, for if King, Lords and Commons are the powers divided or balanced, then—since they represent respectively monarchy, aristocracy and democracy—the constitution is a mixed constitution uniting all these three forms. It may be added that Paley's view is the general English view of his time. It is expounded by Burke in the Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents (Works, in Bolin's edition, I, p. 333), and also in the Reflections where the constitution is described as 'the engagement and pact of society' by which 'the constituent parts of a State are obliged to hold their public faith with each other' (Works, II, p. 204). This general idea is criticised by Paine, both in his Common Sense of 1776 (where he assumes that 'the component parts of the English constitution' are 'the base remains of two ancient tyrannies', monarchy and aristocracy, 'compounded with some new republican materials in the presence of the commons'), and then argues that 'to say that the constitution of England is a union of three powers, reciprocally checking each other, is farceal!'), and in the Rights of Man of 1791-2 (where in Part I, Conclusion, he criticises 'mixed government, or, as it is sometimes ludicrously styled, a government of this that and the other', as a cause of corruption (because the hereditary part tries to buy up the elective) and of irresponsibility (because each part tries to shuffle off blame on the others) ... It seems curious, by the way, that the English thought of the eighteenth century does not regard the judicature as a 'part' of the Constitution, in any way parallel to the other 'parts' of which we have spoken. But the reason is simple. Concentration on the King in Parliament eliminates

Division of powers and the mixed constitution

[Paley, Burke and Paine]

the judges, who are not, as a body, a 'part' of that organisation. At the same time we must notice that Paley, when he comes to the administration of Justice (vi, c. 8), is quite clear that it is 'the first maxim of a free State' that 'the legislative and judicial characters be kept separate', and that there should be a 'division of the legislative and judicial functions'. Similarly Burke, though he regards the King and the two Houses as the constituent parts of the State, and as jointly sovereign, also says in his Reflections (Works, II, 476) that 'whatever is supreme in a State ought to have as much as possible its judicial authority so constituted, as not only not to depend upon it, but in some sort to balance it'. On the general theory of the parts of the constitution and separation of powers see the Report of the Committee on Ministers' Powers (Cmd 4060), pp. 8 ff.]

*The theory of the mixed constitution
in Germany*

149. See, e.g., Wolff, Instit §§993, 1004, Daries, §767 (but he argues, in §§786-7, that limited monarchy is not a forma mixta), Nettelbladt, §§1142, 1155-7, 1197 (who suggests, in dealing with the mixed constitution, that sovereignty can belong to several 'Subjects' at the same time in any one of three ways—(1) in partes divisa, or (2) indivisa, on a basis of joint ownership, or (3) partly divided and partly joint—and that none of these ways is absurd), and Ickstatt, Opus II, op. 1, c. 1, §§18-21 (who takes the same line).

Hoffbauer (Naturrecht, pp. 307-14) treats mixed constitutions with special fullness. He divides them into three kinds—'limited', 'the mixed in the proper sense of the word', and 'partly limited and partly mixed'. He is the only writer who attempts, after distinguishing the different 'Subjects' of sovereignty involved, to re-unite them again in 'a moral person in the wider sense' (pp. 206, 292), but he does so by extending the conception of the moral person to a point at which it ceases even to imply the existence of a partnership among the different juxtaposed 'Subjects' (p. 190, cf. n. 190 to §16).

140. Frederick the Great himself (Antimach c. 19) had already declared that the English Constitution was more worthy to be adopted as a model than the French.

141. Justi ranks as the best constitution the form which is a 'mixture' of the three simple forms, with a 'division' and 'equilibrium' of the different 'powers', and this is the basis of his sketch of an ideally good constitution for all times and places (Grundrisz, §§135-69, Natur und Wesen, §§51-61, 93-7, 142).

142. A. L. von Schlozer holds that all Principes simplices are a menace, and only a Principes compositus is endurable. We must therefore mix forms of State, as a physician mixes his drugs, and a mixture of the three forms, with a division of sovereignty, is 'the best attempt of poor humanity, which anyhow must have a State'. This ideal form has been attained in England, 'but it has not been discovered by Philosophy, or Romulus, or the Earl of Leicester.* it is due to accident, guided by bon Sens, and favoured by circumstances', pp. 144-55, §§23-8, p. 115, §3.

143. Kant achieves this result by his famous comparison of the legislative, executive and judicial powers to the three terms (major premise, minor premise, and conclusion) in a practical syllogism, Works, VI, pp. 418-20, VN, pp. 131-6, 159-60. The three powers are co-ordinate with one another as 'independent moral persons', but at the same time, inasmuch as none of the three can usurp any of the functions of the other two, each is also subordinated to the others, ibid viii, p. 134. Cf also p. 153 supra.

144 See Pufendorf, J. n. et g. viii, c. 12, §§ 1-4 (it follows, he argues, that responsibility for past debts continues, ranks and orders still remain the same, etc.), Alberti, c. 15, §§ 5-9, Schmier, II, c. 4, s. 2, § 1, Locke, II, c. 19, §§ 211 sqq., Hertius, Opusc. 1, 1, p. 296, §§ 11-12, II, c. 3, p. 54, §§ 7-8, Gundling, c. 38, §§ 111 sqq., Scheidemantel, III, pp. 409 sqq.

145. Pufendorf, loc. cit. §§ 5-6, argues that when a State is divided into a number of States, its debts must also be divided pro rata. An independent colony is not, however, responsible for the debts of the mother-country, since this is a case not of alteration but of procreation. When several States unite to form an entirely new State, rights and liabilities are transferred to this new State, and when a previously independent State is made a province, the State annexing it must similarly take over its liabilities, along with its rights, as in ipso corpore haerentia. Cf also Schmier, loc. cit., who holds that divisio or uno does not mean the destruction of the existing political authority, but partition of it or participation in it, Hertius (Opusc. 1, 1, pp. 293 sqq., §§ 9-10), who distinguishes the four cases of merger, annexation, simple adhesion, and personal union, Gundling, c. 38, Scheidemantel, III, pp. 408-26.

On complete disintegration of the State, either through the total disappearance of its physical basis or the total dissolution of its nexus, cf Pufendorf, loc. cit. § 8, Schmier, V, c. 4, s. 2, § 3, Alberti, c. 15, § 10, Hertius, loc. cit. p. 295, § 10, Locke, II, c. 19, § 211, Rousseau, III, c. 11.

146 Cf nn. 126, 129, 147, 161, 168, 170, 186, 213-14, and 238 to § 16, and also n. 7 to § 17.

The most detailed treatment of the question [i.e. the question of the nature of the 'person of the State' when the Ruler is a collective body of persons] is to be found in Ickstatt, Opusc. II, op. 1, de jure majorum in conclusis civitatis communibus formandis. He starts from the principle that a decision of the State is a voluntas totius reipublicae determinata de medio quodam saluti publicae effectum dandi, that this determination of the will belongs to the 'active Subject' of 'supreme power', and that it is therefore achieved by the will of a 'single moral person' in a monarchy, and by the decision of a 'composite moral person', based on previous deliberation and argument, in 'polyarchical' forms of State. He proceeds, on the basis of this principle, to deal with majority-decisions both under jus publicum universale (c. 1) and under the public law of Germany (c. 2). See also Heincke, I, c. 3, §§ 16-23.

147. This was regarded as one of the cases in which unus homo plures personas sustinet, cf nn. 139, 159 and 173 to § 16. See also Huber, I, c. 3, §§ 24-38, and Nettelbladt, § 1194.

148 Titius refuses to distinguish public and private law by the different Public and Private purposes to which they are directed, 'as is generally done', he prefers private law to distinguish them by the different 'Subjects' of rights to which they relate. Public law relates to Subditi constituendi, and to Imperantes constituendi et constituti qua tales, private law relates to Subditi constituti, and to Imperantes juxta conditionem privatam. Accordingly, while Subditi constituti in a formed and operative State [as contrasted with Subditi who have still 'to be constituted'] when the State is in process of formation] no longer possess a persona publica, and have only a private personality, the Ruler always possesses a persona duplex, and we must always distinguish his public and his

*Rules for the action of a collective
Ruler*

private personality. There are, however, mixed situations (such as that presented by the private law peculiar to princely families),* and the 'private person' of the Principis is not necessarily subdita (Spec. iur. publ. 1, c. 1, §§43-52).

149. Cf e.g. Huber, I, 9, c. 5, §72; Hert, Comment. et Op. I, 3, p. 52, §§4-5; Wolff, Instit. §1012 (where a distinction is drawn between actus regi et prouti).

The Ruler and his officials

150. Mevius, for example (Prodromus, v, §29), and Hert (loc. cit. p. 53, §6) argue that the Ruler, and therefore the State itself, acts when the ministrum summae potestatis acts, provided that the latter are acting within the limits of their office. Schmier, on the other hand, argues altogether in terms of private law (III, c. 5, nos. 48-64, de obligatione summae potestatis ex facto et non facto officialium). See also Stryck, Diss. IV, no. 15, de obligatione Principis ex facto ministeri.

The inheritance of obligations by a Ruler

151. Huber, I, 9, c. 5, §§53-72 obligationes, quae propter rem publicam initas sunt, tenent omnino successorem, non ut haeredem, sed ut caput curiatis, immo ut ipsam Civitatem where such obligations are concerned, there is no question of probabilis ratio, versio† and the like, the only question is whether the Imperans, qua personam Civitatis constitutus, has acted within 'the limits of his power'. Pufendorf, J. n. et g. VIII, c. 10, §8 ipsa civitas obligata, but its obligation exists only when there is probabilis ratio, and does not extend in infinitum. Schmier, II, c. 4, § 1, §3 the question is whether the corpus Universitatis is bound, and this is the case when a contract has been made, nomine populi et ad salutem communem, within the sphere of the Ruler's office.

All these three writers, it should be added, seek to apply the usual rules of simple inheritance in dealing with 'patrimonial' States, it is only when they are dealing with regna voluntaria or usfructuaria that they distinguish between inheritance of private property and succession to the Crown. Titius (IV, c. 5) opposes this point of view. He argues that when a Ruler has duly acted in the name of the Res publica, and thus the *Res publica per caput suum volunt, his successor incurs responsibility in all cases alike [whether the monarchy be patrimonial or non-patrimonial] for one and the self-same reason—viz. that res publica velut persona immortalis adhuc durat et nunc etiam adhuc vult. It is true that in non-patrimonial monarchies the successor does not take over his legal position from the defunctus, but he takes over his position, none the less, from the civitas ipsa. The analogy of the limited responsibility of a tenant succeeding to a fief does not hold good [in regard to a non-patrimonial monarchy] the new tenant of the fief succeeds to a homo singularis, while the new holder of the Crown succeeds to the caput corporis liberi et adhuc durantis, in the one case it is the factum defuncti which is in question, while in the other it is the factum personae videnti. The same rule, therefore, applies to elective [or non-patrimonial] monarchies as to other forms, and exceptions [from this general rule of the successor's responsibility] can only be recognised when there has been an act of the predecessor contravening the fundamental laws—for then it can be said that res publica non egit—or when there has been a case of inconsulente prodigalitas or some other special circumstance. [Roughly expressed,

* The Haarecht or dynastic rules regulating e.g. marriage.

† Versio = versio in rem = an application of money or other proceeds by the previous ruler to the res to which the new ruler succeeds, so that the new ruler benefits by such application, and may therefore be held to incur a correlative obligation. Cf. n. 89 to § 14.

the difference between Titus and his three predecessors is that they were ready to allow that the hereditary king of a patrimonial monarchy inherited all the rights and obligations of his predecessor in title, but held that a non-hereditary king was in a different position, Titus, on the contrary, contends that there is no difference between the two, because in either case the rights and obligations are really those of the immortal State, and their continuity is not affected in any way by the hereditary or elective character of the Ruler. Perhaps we shall understand the theory of the predecessors of Titus better if we assume that in their view a 'patrimonial' monarchy is not simply an hereditary monarchy, it is a monarchy in which, as Loysen says, 'the king by title of prescription possesses or owns sovereignty', and therefore (if sovereignty be regarded as the essence of the State) owns, or is, the State (l'État c'est moi). On this basis the king in such a monarchy of course takes over everything alike from his predecessor—public rights equally with private, and public obligations equally with private—because there is no distinction between public and private, all public status having become the possession or property of the king. When we get to non-patrimonial monarchies, we shall have to distinguish 'private' and 'public', but if we hold the view of patrimonial monarchies just described, it will only be when we get to monarchies other than patrimonial that we shall begin to make this distinction. Titus, we may add, is really challenging the idea at the bottom of the 'patrimonial theory', at any rate by implication.]

J. P. von Ludewig (Op. 1, 1, op. 8, pp. 539–646, De obligatione successoris in principatus) puts the conception of patrimonial monarchies completely aside, and thus rejects the usual distinctions drawn by other writers. He uses, as the thread to guide him through the labyrinth, the dictum of Baldus, that the successor is responsible if, and to the extent that, there has been action nomine et auctoritate Republicae inter tot mortes principum suorum immortalis (c. 1, §8). He accordingly denies that the successor is bound in any case where the 'limits of the office and dignity' have been overstepped by his predecessor, and he therefore decides the question of the extent of the successor's responsibility, in any particular case, by the formula imperii [which fixes 'the limits of the office and dignity'], c. 4. But even Ludewig, in the issue, falls back into a private-law point of view, cc. 5–7 [i.e. he lets drop the thread of the public-law rights and duties of the immortal Res publica, and goes back to terms of the private-law rights and duties of the personal ruler].

152 J. H. Bochmer (P. spec. 1, c. 3, §35, n, c. 3, §16) goes to the length of making all responsibility [incumbent upon a successor] depend simply and solely upon hereditary succession to the universitas juris, and he accordingly considers successores titulo singulari (e.g. rulers by right of election or by virtue of contract) as not intrinsically obliged, because they rule ex novo plane jure. But he adds that it is proper for such rulers to recognise any act of a predecessor which has been done intatu officii or has brought advantage to the State.

153 See the author's work on Althusius, pp. 305–6. The only dispute turned on the question, what was necessary to constitute legitimation [of an irregular ruler]. At first, thinkers were generally content to answer, 'The express or tacit assent of the people'. Later, we find the advocates of popular sovereignty insisting exclusively on the necessity of an absolutely free assent of the people (e.g. Sidney, III, § 31, and Locke, II, c. 16,

When the usurper becomes legitimate

§§ 175–96, c. 17, §§ 197–8), while the advocates of the sovereignty of the Ruler require, in addition, an act of renunciation by the legitimate ruler (e.g. Kestner, c. 7, §§ 20–1, H. Cocceji, De regime usurpatum rege ejecto, Frankfort, 1705, Schmier, II, c. 2, s. 2, § 1, nos. 82–98, Nettelbladt, §§ 1267–8, and Achenwall, II, § 98). Often, however, the mere fact of possession was allowed to confer a prescriptive title to ruling authority.

From an opposite point of view [i.e. from a point of view which does not seek to safeguard the rights of the legitimate ruler] we find Hobbes (Leviathan, c. 21), Couring and J. H. Boehmer (P. spec. III, c. 12, § 17) declaring that the people is quit of all responsibility to the legitimate ruler as soon as he is no longer in a position to protect them, while Horn (II, c. 9, §§ 4, 21), though rejecting prescription as a title to rule, allows majesty to be extinguished by the de facto acquisition of majesty by a new ruler. The theory of the fait accompli then gains ground gradually, even among the disciples of Natural Law.

154. The stricter school of thinkers continued to maintain the old theory—that any representation of the State by a usurper was impossible, that all his acts of government were void, and imposed no obligation, that refusal of obedience to him was the right and duty of every individual, and even that private persons were free to attack him as a public enemy and put him to death. We find this view not only in Althusius and the other monarchomachs, in Suarez and the rest of the Catholic writers on Natural Law, and in Bodin, Arnaeac and their successors, but also in Huber (I, 9, c. 1, c. 5, § 51), Schmier (loc. cit.), Fénelon (who holds, c. VIII, that le Roi de fait and le Roi de droit must be distinguished, and that the theory of obedience being due even to the de facto king, as Roi de Providence, is erroneous), H. Cocceji (loc. cit.), Nettelbladt (§ 1267) and others.

On the other hand, we find Grotius—on the ground that some sort of government is necessary—already contending that the people is obliged to obey the actual holder of political authority, in things necessary, even before there has been any legitimization by longum tempus or by pactum (I, c. 4, § 15), and he therefore limits the right of resistance to any actual ruler (ibid. §§ 16–20), just as he also holds (II, c. 14, § 14) that contracts made by a ruler during an interregnum involve the people and the subsequent legitimate ruler, at the very least, in responsibility de in rem verso [i.e. for expenditure incurred, as we might say, 'in connection with the estate', cf. n. 151, supra]. Pufendorf has a different theory: the usurper genuinely represents the State in its external relations, and he thus binds it in that respect by his donations etc., but internally his acts—his laws as well as the donations or alienations he makes—can be rescinded by the legitimate authority, J. n. et g. VIII, c. 12, § 4. On the theory of the fait accompli, the usurper represents the authority of the State at all points, even in regard to his subjects [i.e. internally no less than externally], as soon as the expulsion of the rightful owner of political authority has been achieved. Cf. Boehmer, loc. cit., and also Kant, Works, VII, p. 139.

155. Horn, refusing to recognize any personality of the State, naturally ascribes the ownership of all public property to the Principes alone, De civ. II, c. 3, §§ 5–9.

156. Cf. especially Mevius (Prodromus, V, § 32); Huber (who speaks of public property as being in patrimonio civitatis, since the civitas has jus personarum, II, 4, c. 1, §§ 24sqq.), Pufendorf (who regards public property as owned by the civitas qua talis, and considers the king as having only the rights of a tutor thereon, so that he has no right to alienate it apart from the people, J. n. etg. VIII, c. 5, § 8, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 15, § 5), Titius (m, c. 7, §§ 25sqq.), Wolff (who distinguishes bona regis regia et publica from bona privata seu propria, Instit. § 1012), Daries (bona publica sunt in dominio totius civitatis, bona privata in dominio curum, the latter partly belonging to the Prince and partly to his subjects, §§ 687sqq.), Nettelbladt (§§ 1347sqq.), Achenwall (n, § 123), Scheidemantel (who speaks of 'the property of the whole nation', assigns 'its supreme administration' to the sovereign, but assumes a right of the whole nation to consent to its alienation, pp. 320sqq., 333sqq.)

157 Theorists began by distinguishing res publicae from patrimonium reipublicae, according as public property was destined for common use by all individuals (ad usum singulorum) or for the immediate purposes of the State itself (ad usum universorum) of Huber, n, 4, c. 4, §§ 25sqq., Titius, m, c. 7, §§ 5sqq., Daries, § 687, Scheidemantel, pp. 330sqq. Classification of State property

In regard to the first of these categories (res publicae) there was a difference of opinion. Were res nullius to be included without further question in the category of State-property (this was the view of Horn, loc. cit. §§ 5-9, and Titius, loc. cit. §§ 11sqq.), or at any rate (if that were not allowed) could they be brought into this category by a declaration made by the State, in virtue of its right of majesty (the view of Gundling, c. 36, §§ 217-20, and of Schiedemantel, loc. cit.)? Or did res nullius come to be the property of the State only in virtue of its actually exercising a right of occupation, such as it was intrinsically free to exercise, though the right might be to some extent limited by other rights of exclusive appropriation which had their basis in positive law (this is the view of Huber, n, 4, c. 1, §§ 30sqq., c. 2, §§ 12-25, and of Nettelbladt, §§ 1345-6)?

State-property in the strict sense (i.e. patrimonium reipublicae) was generally divided into property belonging to the aerarium and property belonging to the fiscus (cf. Pufendorf, loc. cit., Gundling, c. 36, §§ 211-2, Wolff, §§ 1038-9), but Gundling remarks that there is fundamentally no difference between the two. [Some remarks may be added in elucidation. (1) The conception of res nullius is fully discussed by Pound, Introduction to the Philosophy of Law, pp. 197sqq. (2) On occupation as a basis of State-property, and on the possible limitation of the State's right of occupation by positive-law rights, cf. Mommsen, History of Rome (Eng. trans.), m, p. 96, where (in connection with the legislation of the Gracchi) the problem is discussed how far the State's right to its 'occupied domains' could be modified by private rights, based on positive-law titles of long prescription or recent acquisition. (3) Finally, as regards the distinction between aerarium and fiscus, we may note that this really belongs to the system of dyarchy instituted by Augustus, under which the senate and the princeps seemed to rule conjointly, and while the former had the aerarium, the latter had the fiscus as a separate treasury—both, be it noted, being public and official treasuries.]

158. Huber distinguishes four species of property in a monarchy—res privatae principis, res dominicae, res fiscales and res aerariae—but he admits that the second and the third are often difficult to distinguish (n, 4, c. 4, §§ 35-50). Gundling (loc. cit. §§ 213-16) and Wolff (§ 1040) both rank demesne as a third species of public property, by the side of that of the aerarium and that of the fiscus, and they hold that the prince possesses a limited right of ownership in the demesne, being unable to alienate it freely on account of its connection with territorial sovereignty. The Ruler's demesne

Demesne included in State property

159 This is the view of Daries, §§691-4. He simply distinguishes bona fisci and bona aerarii, including under the former what is intended immediately for the personal support of the territorial prince [thus, of course, differs from the old Roman use of the term], and under the latter all that is directly designed for the maintenance of the State itself, and, on this basis, he allows the prince administratio only of the latter, but gives him both administratio and ius utendi of the former.* A similar line is taken by Achenwall (ii, §124), and more especially by Nettelbladt (§§1347-9), who distinguishes from the demesne [which is the property of the State] not only the patrimonium principis, but also the bona familiae eius quo princeps est (Haus- und Stammgüter).

Ownership of the State's territory

160. Cf Wolff, Insti. §1125, Nettelbladt, §§1144-51. Only as regards patrimonial States was the conception of 'property', amounting to a full right of ownership, extended to include the whole country, but many thinkers rejected the whole idea as untenable for that very reason [i.e. they rejected the whole idea of the patrimonial State, because it involved as a consequence the King's ownership of his territory as his own property]. Cf p 144, supra.

Dominium eminens in Horn and other writers

161. Horn (ii, c 4) is the strongest advocate of the view that dominium eminens is not only imperium, but a verum dominium, a real legal property which the State has reserved for itself in distributing private property, and which signifies the whole body of the limits to which private property is subject. But see also Huber (i, 3, c 6, §§30-53), Pufendorf (Elem. i, def 5, §5), J H Bochmer (i, c 4, §§25-7), Stryck (Diss. xiv, no 7) and Wolff (Insti. §1065).

Other views in regard to this question

162. Tiusius, for example, distinguishes sharply between dominium publicum, which only differs from dominium praediorum in that the 'Subject' or owner is different, and dominium eminens, which is really pars imperii, and only nominally 'property' or dominium (iii, c 5, §51, c 7, §2). Gundling argues that the basis of expropriation is not dominium eminens, which only belongs to the prince in a civitas hereditis [i.e. in a patrimonial State], but imperium eminens (c 36, §§226-9). Daries also rejects the conception of dominium eminens as a basis for the rights of taxation and of expropriation of bona privata (§§695-701). Cf also Achenwall, who writes of a ius eminens which takes the two forms of dominium eminens over things and potestas eminens over persons (ii, §§145-7), and Scheademantel, who holds that the rights of 'majesty' in regard to private possessions are not derived from any property vested in it, but from its superior authority, though many writers call this 'a superior property' or eminent domain (pp 360-4).

* The translator, in this clause, has inverted the statement in Gierke's text, which apparently makes Daries assign to the prince only administratio of bona fisci, but both administratio and ius utendi of bona aerarii.

§ 18 THE NATURAL-LAW THEORY OF CORPORATIONS

1 Cf e.g. Cellarius, Pol cc 2-8, Johannes a Felde, Elem 1, c 1, Boecler, 1, cc 2-6, Clasen, 1, cc 2-6, Mullerus, Instit 1, cc 2-7, Horn, De civ 1, cc. 1-4, Alberti, cc 10-14. See also Pufendorf (J n et g vi-vii and De off hom et civ II, cc 2-5), who, however, refuses to admit the Family as a separate and independent stage in the development of associations (which would set it on the same level as the three personae morales compositae constituted by the domestic groups of husband and wife, parent and child, and master and servant), and accordingly designates 'the most perfect society' of the State as societas quarta. Thomasius takes the same line [i.e. he recognises only the three domestic groups and the State as societies] in Institut jur div III, cc 1-7 (cf. also c 1, §§ 13-14, where he argues that the Family, regarded as a union of the three societas simplices, has no specific purpose of its own), and so does Schmier (1, c 2, ss 1-4). Cf also Praschus, §§ 6-11, Placcius, Bk 1, Rachelius, 1, titl 15-31.

Even Wolff, although he begins with a detailed theory 'of authority and society (Herrschaft und Gesellschaft) in general' (Instit §§ 833-52), is like other thinkers [i.e. in omitting fellowships and local communities], he only admits as natural-law groups (a) the societies constituted under the family-system (though he allows four of these—the 'marital', the 'parental', the 'magisterial' and the Family—§§ 854-971), and (b) the State (§§ 972sqq.). Achenwall takes exactly the same line. (Proleg §§ 91sqq. and Part II, §§ 1sqq., where he treats of societas in genere, of the four societas domesticas, and of the State).

2 Thomasius (loc. cit. c 1, §§ 15-32) explicitly justifies a direct transition from the Family to the State, without any consideration of intervening groups, on the grounds (1) that a local community has no specific purpose, and (2) that a State might possibly be composed only of a single territorial community, which proves that vicus et provinciae non tam a curiae differunt specie ac finibus, quam ut partes a suo toto, § 30 [i.e. local communities differ from a State, not as being a different species with their own specific purpose, but only in the way in which parts differ from the whole which they jointly constitute—that is to say, in the way of quantity]. Thomasius implicitly assumes that a 'part' is the same, in kind and purpose, as the 'whole' to which it belongs. Schmier takes the same line, 1, c 2, s 4, no 127.

3 Thomasius, Institut jur div 1, c 1, § 98.

4 Cf Schmier, v, c 1, who speaks of subditus conjunctum aut collegiatae speciei. See also Pufendorf, J n et g viii, c 2, §§ 21-2, Hertius, Elem II, 2, § 41, J. H. Boehmer, P spec II, cc. 4-5, Scheidevantel, III, pp. 244sqq.

5 See [as examples of a theory which admits a variety of societies, over and above the Family and the State] Mevius, who enumerates in his list societas domestica, with its three species, the corpus, pagi, urbes, terrae seu regna, foedera (Prodromus, v, § 19), Micraelius, who reckons societas domestica (1, cc 2-6), the vicus and pagus (c. 7, §§ 1-24), the tribus, collegium, corpus et universitas (ibid. §§ 25-32), oppida, regiones and civitas (c. 8); Knichen, who includes the four 'domestic societies', collegia, territoria, and the civitas (1, cc 4-6), and Beermann, who makes two divisions—the one including the Family, corpora,

The position of the Family

Thomasius on local communities as only 'parts'

Theories favourable to intervening groups

Leibniz on groups

collegia, systemata and the respublica, the other embracing via, pagi and urbes, which, however, are only partes integrantes respublicae (Med cc 7-11)

6 Leibniz, Deutsche Schriften, 1, pp 414-20 Leibniz starts, it is true, by enumerating only six sorts of 'natural society'—the four societies of the family-system (those of husband and wife, parent and child, and master and servant, with the addition of the household composed of these three and intended to provide for temporal needs), the civic community (the town or rural area, intended to promote temporal well-being), and the Church of God (for the purpose of eternal felicity). But when he comes to the 'classification of societies', he distinguishes equal and unequal, limited and unlimited, and simple and compound, and he adds that 'limited' societies require federation, as they cannot all attain their purpose of promoting well-being by themselves. The final result is thus a system of many societies, including households, social groups (guilds or castes), villages, monasteries, orders, towns, rural areas, and finally the whole human species, which is 'also a community' when regarded as the Church of God and other groups regarded as alike

The State

7. S Cocceji, for example, in his Novum systema, after giving an account of the Family (iii, c 4) and the State (c 5), expressly declares that 'the like' (per ratio) is true of all corpora et universitates (§ 205), and later on, when he is dealing with the conception of the corpus artificiale, he treats the State as only a 'conspicuous example' of that type, along with the collegium, the judicium and the familia (iv, §§ 280-1). Wolff, Heineccius, Achenwall and other writers also treat corporations as the products of a like process to that which has brought the State into existence

8 See the section on jurisprudentia naturalis generalis socialis in Nettelbladt's Systema naturale (§§ 326-414), and the section on jurisprudentia positiva generalis socialis in his Systema jurispr. pos. (§§ 846-912).

9. Cf. e.g. Daries, Inst. jurispr. univ., Part. spec., sect 3-5, Heincke, Prot. c 1, §§ 4-6, Hoffbauer, Naturrecht, pp 186sqq

10 Cf. Perezius, Jus publ pp 318-19, M. Schookius, De seditionibus, Groningen, 1664, iii, c 8, pp 835sqq, Felwinger, Dis. de coll. et sodal. pp 308sqq, §§ 18sqq. Mastrilio, De magistratibus, Venice, 1667, iii, c 4, § 441. Beccmann, Med c 10, § 8, Knuchen, Opus pol. 1, c 5, th 4

11 Cf. Horn, De civ. II, c 2, § 14 majestas only can assemble people together in comitia, concilia et concuentus, qui sine superioris praescitu aut iusus multitudinem congregare fuerit ausus, jus majestatis praecipuum nefare inviolat. See also Schookius, loc cit pp 832sqq, 837, 839, Felwinger, loc cit §§ 51-3, Mastrilio, loc. cit. §§ 444-6

12 Cf. Schookius, loc cit pp 835sqq (there can be no elections and no assembly of any kind without governmental supervision and co-operation), Felwinger, §§ 44-7, Mastrilio, iii, c 3, §§ 47sqq and c 4, §§ 444-6 (the Prince must confirm rendiciones, impositiones, alienaciones, expensiones, electiones officialium et alia acta universitatum the utmost that is possible without the assent of the prince is the raising of a levy in an emergency, when there is danger in delay), Knuchen, 1, c 5, th 8-9, Beccmann, c 10, § 8, Andler, Jurispr. pp 102sqq (all statuta of corporations require confirmation)

Myler ab Ehrenbach contends (c 5, pp 198sqq) that territorial towns [i.e. towns in one of the territorial principalities of Germany] and all other territorial corporations can never appoint magistrates proprio jure, but must always appoint them auctoritate principis territorialis such magistrates, therefore, are subject to confirmation and supervision by the prince, and derive

Theories of
'concession'

State control of meetings

State control of group-life

all their jurisdiction from the 'ocean' of his plenitude of power within his territory, the territorial prince retains a co-ordinate jurisdiction, his delegatus has precedence, and his personal appearance causes the lapse of all corporate authority

Von Seckendorf, too, has nothing to say about local communities or corporations as exercising rights of their own in a principality he only mentions them as the objects of the prince's care and supervision (ii, c. 8, §9, c. 14, m, c. 2, §5, and c. 3 to c. 6, §7).

18. Schookius, p. 838, Felwinger, §§54sqq; Knichen, 1, c. 5, th. 15 (a corporation may be abolished not only for defect or misuse of its powers, but also utilitatis publicae causa), von Seckendorf, add. 42 to ii, c. 8, §9 (where he argues for freedom of trade and the abolition of guilds)

14. Spinoza would abolish all collegia or guilds in an aristocracy, when an aristocratic State is composed of a single city (Tract. pol. c. 8, §5), but in an aristocratic State composed of a number of cities he would allow the several cities considerable independence, even though they ought to constitute unum imperium and not a mere confederation (c. 9). In a monarchy he suggests mechanical subdivisions, which he calls familiae, as the basis of the royal council (cc. 6-7).

Hume, in sketching the constitution of an ideal State (in which he refuses to follow the fantasies of Plato and More, but allows some merit to Harrington's Oceania), divides the country into 100 counties, and each county into 100 parishes. Each parish chooses one representative, and the 100 representatives of each county choose 10 county-magistrates and a senator. The 100 senators of the whole country exercise executive power the county representatives, meeting in their particular counties, 'possess the whole legislative power of the commonwealth—the greater number of counties deciding the questions, and where they are equal, let the senate have the casting vote'*. In this way the advantages of a large and those of a small commonwealth may be combined (Essays, Part II, Essay xvi, Idea of a Perfect Commonwealth).

15. In the article Fondation, in vol. VII, p. 75, §6 of the Encyclopédie, Turgot vindicates for the State the right of reforming or completely suppressing all foundations. The public good is the supreme law, and the State must not be deterred from pursuing it either by a superstitious regard for the intentions of the founder or by fear of the pretended rights of certain bodies: ni par la crainte de blesser les droits prétdus de certains corps, comme si les corps particuliers avaient quelques droits vis-à-vis l'État, les citoyens ont des droits, et des droits sacrés pour le corps même de la société, ils existent indépendamment d'elle, ils en sont les éléments nécessaires et ils n'y entrent que pour se mettre avec tous leurs droits sous la protection de ces mêmes lois, auxquelles ils sacrifient leur liberté, mais les corps particuliers n'existent point par eux-mêmes, ni pour eux, ils ont été formés pour la société et ils doivent cesser d'être au moment qu'ils cessent d'être utiles

16. Contr. Soc. II, c. 3. Quand il se fait des brigues, des associations partielles aux dépens de la grande, la volonté de chacune de ces associations devient générale par rapport à ses membres et particulière par rapport à l'État, on peut dire alors qu'il n'y a plus autant de volonts que d'hommes, mais seulement autant que d'associations. Les différences deviennent moins nombreuses et donnent un résultat moins général. If

Attitude of Spinoza and Hume to groups

Turgot on 'particular bodies'

* The translator has cited Hume's own words instead of Gierke's paraphrase, which is not quite accurate one of these associations gains preponderance, there is no volonté générale at all.

17. Ibid. il importe donc, pour avoir bien l'énoncé de la volonté générale, qu'il n'y ait pas de société particulière dans l'État. If there are such societies, they must be made as numerous and as equal as possible. ^c iv, c. 1

*Churches and church-
property*

18. The most important of the opinions expressed in the Assembly, with regard to the theoretical legal basis of secularisation, are collected in Hubler's work on Der Eigentümer des Kirchenguts (Leipzig 1868) and in P. Janet's article on La propriété pendant la Révolution Française (Revue des deux Mondes, xxii (1877), pp. 334-49). [See E. de Pressensé, L'Église et la Révolution Française, 1890.] These opinions, as a rule, start from a general view of the relation of all corporations to the State, since there was almost universal agreement about the nature of church-property as corporation-property. [Burke has a striking passage in the Reflections (Works, Bohn's edition, II, 378) on the revolutionary view of church-property as corporation-property. 'They say', he writes, 'that ecclesiastics are fictitious persons, creatures of the State, whom at pleasure they may destroy, and of course limit and modify in every particular that the goods they possess are not properly theirs, but belong to the State which created the fiction.' He does not seek to refute this conception of the persona ficta, he simply dismisses it as a 'miserable destruction of persons', and he contents himself with arguing that church-property is 'identified with the mass of private property, and that its owners have the same title of accumulated prescription as other owners'. Mackintosh, in his reply to Burke (Vind Gall sect. 1, ad finem), makes a distinction between the Church and other corporations. Other corporations are 'voluntary associations of men for their own benefit', and their property is part of the mass of private property, so that 'corporate property is here as sacred as individual'. But the Church is a peculiar corporation—'the priesthood is a corporation endowed by the country, and destined for the benefit of other men', so that it may properly be limited or modified if its possessions and powers are not used for that benefit.]

*Views on the ownership of church-property
in the Assembly*

19. The Abbé Maury, for example, argued, on October 13, 1789, that church-property was the property of the clerical corporation, and the property of a corps was as truly property as that of individus. It was sophistry to distinguish between the legal basis of the one sort of property and that of the other in both cases the right of property was not prior to the law, but was created by the law, and détruire un corps est un homicide, because it is to take away its vie morale. The Abbé de Montesquieu argued to the same effect on October 31. We also find isolated attempts to defend the theory of the property-rights of institutions [i.e. to argue that even foundations or Stiftungen, as distinct from the corps or corporation, may acquire property rights] this was the line taken by Montlosier on October 13. Another speaker, the Abbé Grégoire, in a speech of October 23, ascribes church-property to founders and their families, or to parishes and provinces. [The debate about the question, 'Who owns church-property', is as old as the investiture-contest in the time of Gregory VII—when one side, representing the lay tradition of the Eigentumskirche (or 'proprietary church'), answered, 'The laity (kings and magnates) who built the church and own the land on which it stands', and the other, representing the ideas of canon law, replied, 'The saint to whom the church is dedicated, and, by extension, the institution which represents the saint'. The old issue may be said to be repeated in the French Revolution, with the nation adopting the lay tradition of the Eigen-tumskirche, and challenging the canonical idea of church-property as Anstaltsgut]

20. This is the view which underlies the speeches of the radical orators Mirabeau who argued that church-property was simply the property of the State on church-property in particular, in his speeches of October 31 and November 2, arrives at the conclusion that the real ownership is vested in the nation, although—or rather, because—church-property is owned by corporate bodies. For corporations do not exist, as individuals do, before the creation of civil society, and they are not, as individuals are, éléments de l'ordre social they owe their existence entirely to the State, and they are only its shadows (aggrégations qui ne sont que son ombre). It is the State which, at its discretion, grants or denies them the capacity of owning property, and it can also abolish them and take their property for itself. But if the possessions of a corporation are thus 'only uncertain, momentary and conditional', and even its mere continuance is altogether precarious, we must supposer pour ces biens un maître plus réel, plus durable et plus absolu. We find such a 'master' in the nation celui seul, qui doit pour des biens du corps lorsque ce corps est détruit, est censé en être le maître absolu et incommutable, même dans le temps que le corps existe. Barnave, Malouet, Dupont and Le Chapelier argued in the same sense. Garat, speaking on October 24, added an historical corroboration of this view, Treilhard and Chasset were even more radical, denying altogether the existence of corporate bodies.

21. It was in this sense that Thouret sought, on October 23 and 30, to develop the ideas of Turgot. Les individus et les corps diffèrent par leurs droits, les individus existent avant la loi, ils ont des droits qu'ils tiennent de la nature, des droits imprescriptibles, tel est le droit de propriété tout corps, au contraire, n'existe que par la loi, et leurs droits dépendent de la loi. The State can thus modify or abolish corporations at will. It can withdraw their capacity for holding property, just as it gave it. La destruction d'un corps n'est pas un homicide indeed, its destruction is a duty, what society needs is real owners, and we cannot consider as real owners these propriétaires factices qui, toujours mineurs, ne peuvent toucher qu'à l'usufruct. Les corps n'existent pas par eux, mais par la loi, et la loi doit mesurer l'étendue dans laquelle elle leur donnera la communication des droits des individus tous les corps ne sont que des instruments fabriqués par la loi pour faire le plus grand bien possible, que fait l'ouvrier, lorsque son instrument ne lui convient plus? Il le brise ou le modifie.

Dupont argued in a similar sense on October 24, and Pétion on October 31: Talleyrand had already done so, on the proposal for secularisation, on October 10. The terms of the decree of November 2 corresponded to this line of argument: it did not directly assign church-property to the State. It declared, Tous les biens ecclésiastiques sont à la disposition de la Nation [which could then use them to endow those 'real owners' (the individual peasant or bourgeois) who, on Thouret's argument, are 'what society needs']

22. In his pamphlet on the Tiers État, Sieyès argues that all corporations destroy the unity of the nation, which includes only individuals, and only what is equal and common in all individuals. If public officials let themselves be compelled to form corps, they must lose electoral rights during the term of their office, while as for ordinary citizens, it is a requirement of social order that they should not unite in corporations. It is the very acme of perversity if the legislator should himself create corporations, or should acknowledge and confirm them when they create themselves, or should declare the most privileged and greatest of corporations, the Estates, to be parts of the National Assembly of Political Writings, I, pp. 167-72 [Cf. also Mackintosh, Vind Gall sect. I: 'Laws cannot inspire unmixed patriotism. But ought they for that reason to foment that corporation spirit which is its most fatal enemy?']

Sieyès on Corporations

His defence of corporate property

28. In his Observations sommaires sur les biens ecclésiastiques (1789), Sieyès gives vigorous expression to the idea that, while the existence of every corps moral (clergy, town, hospital, college, and the like) depends on the national will, and while the abolition of a corporation must carry with it the confiscation of its property, it is none the less true that a moral body, so long as it remains such, has rights of property which are no less sacred, and no less inviolable, than those of individuals, or indeed of the nation itself—for the nation, after all, is only a moral body. The State, therefore, may kill corporations, and it may become their heir by doing so, but it cannot legally declare that their property belongs to itself [during such time as they remain corporations], Pol. Writings, I, pp. 461-84. In his pamphlet on Tithes (1789), and in his Proposal for a provisional decree relative to the clergy (1790), Sieyès argues in the same way, ibid. I, pp. 485-98, II, pp. 29-70.

24. Pol. Writings, I, pp. 292sqq (esp. p. 295), 380sqq, 509sqq, 561sqq.

25. Thus he says (in his pamphlet On the means, etc., I, p. 208) that the division into départements is not like that into estates, fraternities and guilds—it is as different as day is from night. But he defends himself from the accusation of wishing to turn France into a federation (preface to part I, p. xii), and from that of having dissolved it into an aggregate of petty republics (II, pp. 225sqq, 235sqq.) He always insists that the départements and communes continue to remain parts of one whole, even though they are recognised as separate wholes for affairs within their own sphere (I, pp. 382-5, 561).

26. He mentions only the Church as a corporative element, and he depicts it in terms of unrelied 'territorialism', Natur und Wesen, §§ 197, 213-220 [On 'territorialism', cf. n. * to p. 89.]

Scheidemannet on associations

27. Cf. I, p. 253. 'We should above all things direct our attention', Scheidemannet writes, 'to the societies in our territorial principalities, for any group in the State, which has been formed by specific agreement, or by mere chance, for the pursuit of a definite object, has an influence on the government, even if it be only in an indirect way. A prudent constitution will allow no secret assemblies, and it will recognise no societies as legal save those which have received the express or tacit assent of majesty.' If this is not done, there will be parties and cabals. Every group should be dissolved and punished. Liberty in England is the mother of mischief, and the Roman laws were wise. No subject can or should institute societies of his own motion (III, pp. 291sqq.) Cf. also I, pp. 295sqq, III, pp. 244, 246 [Even in England we find Paley, who was not illiberal, following line of argument which is not dissimilar (Moral and Political Philosophy, VI, c. III ad finem) 'As ignorance of union, and want of communication, appear amongst the principal preservatives of civil authority, it behoves every State to keep its subjects in this want and ignorance, not only by vigilance in guarding against actual confederations and combinations, but by a timely care to prevent great collections of men from being assembled in the same vicinity. Leagues thus formed and strengthened may overawe or overset

[The views of Paley]

the power of any State'. But Paley, writing in 1785, was probably thinking of the Gordon riots of 1780 and of 'combinations' of workers, and he would have been the last to deprecate the existence of the Tory or, for that matter, of the Whig party.]

28 Cf. i, p. 255: even permitted societies should be kept under careful supervision, they must be made to produce their rules and regulations from time to time, to render accounts, and to submit to visitation. This should particularly be the case with professedly religious societies, but it should also hold good of 'free societies', such as the East India Companies, which are never free in any but a relative sense, and must always be subject to a presumption against their being left independent. Cf. iii, pp. 245-6.

He insists on State control

29 A capacity for rights and duties is only allowed to a corporation as a means to the public benefit, and it is a condition of the exercise of that capacity that a corporation should act in that sense (iii, pp. 292-4).

30. Cf. iii, pp. 293-4, where Scheidemantel requires confirmation of the by-laws of societies, regulation of the subscriptions of their members, the due rendering of accounts, and confirmation of their appointments of officers of their own, cf. also ii, pp. 204sqq, on the necessary limitations and the proper police supervision of guilds, and iii, p. 248, on the constitution, structure and government of local communities (which are instituted 'by command of the Sovereign', and must exercise their rights of legal coercion in his name).

Scheidemantel totally rejects any idea of autonomy [as belonging to societies] law is the declared will of majesty the rules of a privileged society are merely a matter of contract between its members, and they only acquire civil obligation 'when majesty arms them with obligation' (i, pp. 164-6). Customary law, he thinks, is often really a matter of wilful disobedience it generally arises through 'culpable heedlessness or malice', in any case it has no validity if it contravenes reason, or the purpose of the State, or law (i, p. 225).

31 'No good prince, however, will take it for himself except in case of necessity' (iii, p. 293).

32 Thus Scheidemantel includes together, under the head of public societies, not only 'colleges' [of magistrates] which have been instituted for the purpose of exercising powers of government, but also churches, academies, privileged trading companies and local communities which the government has recognised as public, and in the same way he lumps together, under the head of private societies, the privileged as well as the unprivileged, and the simple (i.e. the relations of husband and wife, parent and child, and master and servant) as well as the compound (households, fraternities, guilds), iii, pp. 244-50. Elsewhere he treats schools and universities (ii, pp. 183sqq), academies and learned societies (ibid. pp. 194sqq), and guilds (ibid. pp. 204sqq), purely from the point of view of their being 'police' institutions of the State [i.e. institutions which enable the State to supervise the behaviour of its members]. He even makes 'domestic societies' subject to the general rights of majesty under which all societies have to live and move, iii, pp. 249, 294-7.

*Scheidemantel
treats associations
as State institutions*

33. In his Staatslehre (Works, iv, p. 403) Fichte remarks that the low view of the State which is commonly held may be seen, inter alia, 'in the zeal for liberty, i.e. in lawlessness of acquisition, in the contention that churches, schools, trade-guilds and fraternities—indeed, almost everything that cannot

*Fichte's similar
view*

be expressly referred to civil legislation—are not State-institutions, but institutions proceeding from private persons', with which the State is only concerned in connection with its duty of protection. Fichte is especially concerned to make the guild a definite State-institution (with a fixed membership determined by the Government, and with tests of skill imposed by it, etc.), cf. his Naturrecht, II, p. 58 (Works, III, p. 233), and his Rechtslehre, II, p. 555.

Kant on foundations

84. Thus we find Kant—especially in the appendix to the second edition of his Rechtslehre, I, no. 8 (Works, VII, pp. 120-3), 'on the rights of the State in the way of inspecting perpetual foundations on behalf of its subjects'—placing a definition of the Stiftung in the forefront of his argument. It is 'a voluntary beneficent institution, confirmed by the State, which has been erected for the benefit of certain of its members who succeed to one another's rights until the time of its final extinction'. But [though he thus admits their continuous life,] he proceeds to explain that these 'corporations', in spite of rights of succession, and in spite of the constitution which they enjoy as corpora mystica, may be abolished at any time without any violation of right. When he comes to details, he applies this theory to benevolent institutions for the poor, invalids and the sick, to the Church as a 'spiritual State', to schools, to the nobility as a 'temporary guild-fellowship authorised by the State', to orders; and to foundations based on primogeniture [i.e. to what we should call entails or family settlements].

In another passage of the Rechtslehre (II, note 2, loc. cit. p. 142) he starts from the idea that 'there cannot be any corporation in the State, or Estate, or order, which can transmit land as owner, according to certain rules, for the exclusive use of succeeding generations, ad infinitum'. He proceeds to give as examples the 'order of knights' and the 'order of clergy, called the Church', but he also adds, as another and parallel example, 'pious foundations'.

85. Loc. cit. pp. 120-3, 142-3

86. It is the secularisation of 'commanderies' [the relics of the old Teutonic Order in East Prussia?], and of ecclesiastical endowments, which Kant more particularly justifies—and indeed not only justifies, but demands. Though he supports his demand by an appeal to the change in 'public opinion' which has been produced by 'popular enlightenment', it is significant that he thinks it a sufficient warrant for secularisation if the support previously given to endowments by 'popular opinion' has been withdrawn 'merely by the leaders who are entitled to speak on its behalf' (loc. cit. pp. 121-2, 142-3).

Kant's dislike of voluntary associations

But Kant desires equally to eliminate the system of Estates, and more especially the hereditary Estate of the nobility, loc. cit. p. 123. He even denounces any separate institution or pious foundation for charity or poor-relief, arguing that the only proper system is one of State-provision, by means of regular contributions made by each generation for itself, in the form of legal and compulsory payments, loc. cit. pp. 120-1, 144. [Kant's argument—that each generation should meet its own problems, without the aid of the pious benefactions of the past—is characteristic of an age which was shaking off the yoke of a past which it supposed to be outworn, and proclaiming the right and duty of each generation fare de se, cf. Paine's repeated phrase that 'each generation is competent for its own purposes', and compare also his scheme for the complete transference of all poor-relief to the State (Rights of Man, Part II, c. 5) with Kant's similar proposal. Hegel, in his Philosophy of Law, §§242-5, speaks of the fortuitousness of alms-giving and charitable institutions, and praises, in comparison, a system of obligatory general regulations and orders. He is particularly critical of the boundless charitable foundations in England.]

37. J. n. et g. vii, c. 2, §§21-3. After dealing with these 'peculiar subordinate bodies', Pufendorf proceeds to treat of appointments to public offices [thus connecting associations with the working of the State]. Pufendorf on associations

38. Pufendorf makes an exception in favour of 'colleges' which probari debent, such as the Christian communities in ancient Rome. Apart from this exception, he treats as corpora illegitima not only bodies which are formed for inadmissible objects, but also those which have arisen absque consensu sumorum imperantium.

Like Hobbes, he divides all corpora (including both the legitimate and the illegitimate) into the two species of 'regular' and 'irregular', according as there is a proper unio voluntatum, or some other bond of union (e.g. conspiratio produced by effectus, spes, ira or the like).

39. Accordingly, in a State which has grown from the union of a number of bodies, these bodies must surrender to it whatever is necessary for it a State which allows bodies to enjoy independent rights in public matters is a State which renounces part of its imperium and becomes irregularis et biceps.

40. While the State is entirely and absolutely represented by its Sovereign, it is otherwise with 'bodies', here acts done by the rector (or coetus) who is entrusted with the regimen corporis can be deemed to be the actio totius corporis only when they fall within the corporate sphere, as duly delimited in accordance with the constitution and the laws. Outside that sphere, the agents are personally liable. Pufendorf also regards a 'protestation' against the decisions of an assembly [i.e. the defiance of a 'body' by some of its members] as permissible, and he holds that in a dispute between a corporation and its members non corpus judex erit, sed civitas, cui corpus subest.

41. J. n. et g. vi, c. 1, §1. Quemadmodum corpus humanum ex diversis membris componitur, quae et ipsa, in se considerata, corporum instar prae se ferunt—ita et curvatus ex minoribus curvatus constant

42. Thomasius, however, confines the idea of societas inaequalis to the communion between God and man, and he divides merely human societies into mixtas and aequales. He does not, therefore, use the distinction of 'equal' and 'unequal' societies in determining the relations between the corporation and the State, cf. Instit. iur. div., I, c. 1, §§93-113. In a similar way we find Mullerus (Instit. i, c. 1) Praschus (§§6-11) and other writers, employing this distinction only in order to point out differences of internal structure in the two sorts of society [and not in order to explain their external relations to the State].

43. Cf. n. 156 to §16, supra: see also Pufendorf, Elem. II, 6, §20 (where he applies the argument against guilds).

44. Intro. in ius publ. univ., P. spec. II, c. 4.

45. Loc. cit. §7 n. p. If the Ruler tolerates collegia iugitaria et improba, these bodies have effectus civiles, but if he disapproves of them, even the justest of such 'colleges' (e.g. the early Christian communities) are instantly destitute of all rights. J. H. Boehmer on corporate bodies

Their property

46. Loc. cit. §9 n. r. More especially, these 'public colleges' must render accounts to the sovereign, and they cannot dispose of their property without his consent. This is the case with bona curitatum, communitatum, academiarum, immo et ecclesiarum—quid enim alius sunt quam coetus publici?

Their power of legislation

47. Cf. II, c. 3, §§16–28 and c. 4, §12. Bochmer ascribes legislative activity exclusively to the Sovereign, and he explains the legal validity of customary law, of foreign law [in cases of private international law²] and of 'statutes' [i.e. by-laws of corporations], by his having given them his approbation. He regards municipal self-government in general not as a right belonging to municipalities (städtisches Recht), but as a form of legislative authority delegated to magistratus inferiores. The by-laws of collegia et corpora [i.e. corporate bodies other than municipalities], in regard to their own affairs, are in his view merely pacta among the members, requiring, as such, subsequent confirmation by the sovereign. But the sovereign may go further: he may make even these by-laws [though they are only internal pacta] dependent on his previous sanction, and he is acting rightly if he does so. In any case, he has the two rights of inspectio and directio: he can cancel by-laws which are an abuse, and he can, in general, prescribe the procedure to be followed in any respect.

Their power of jurisdiction

48. Cf. II, c. 3, §26, c. 4, §12 n. u., c. 7, §24, c. 8, §13. Jurisdictio and the power of punishment belong only to the Sovereign or his delegates. collegia and societates aequales have no jurisdictio or jus puniendi. They may appoint arbitri for themselves, but they can never appoint judices without being guilty of majestas lata. They may determine by pact that there shall be certain 'conventional' punishments, but they must leave to the Superior the carrying of them into effect.

Their power of imposing dues on their members

49. Bochmer argues (II, c. 9) that, while all 'societies and colleges' need a 'common chest', an administrator [or treasurer], and subscriptions from their members, there is a difference in this respect between the equal and the unequal society: in aequali societate obligantur membra ex pacto, in inaequali ex imperio. The Sovereign alone has a right of taxation. Any person other than the Sovereign who imposes a contribution must act either ex imperantibus indultu expresso vel tacito, or ex consensu subditorum: he can never act suo jure. In case of necessity, however, the consent of a majority is sufficient [i.e. it counts as the consensus subditorum], and Bochmer even allows that, tempore extremae necessitatis, a community [which would otherwise need the permission of the Sovereign] may act on its own authority—though he adds that this should rather be explained as proceeding ex praesumta voluntate imperantus. See n. 46 supra.

Their officers

50. According to II, c. 6, there can be no public office non ab Imperante. In order, therefore, to appoint 'magistrates' for themselves [i.e. to appoint the officers of any society to which they belong], subjects require the permission of their Ruler. If they choose consules, for example, they are acting non suo, sed Imperantibus nomine: they are therefore responsible to him, and he may deprive them of their right of appointing, and make his own nomination, if they abuse their right of choice. Indeed, the Sovereign cannot allow a right of free election without disturbing his 'majesty', and for that reason he generally requires that his sanction shall be necessary for all elections (§6 n. m). We may notice especially how Bochmer, in dealing with the duty of municipal magistrates to render accounts—a duty which, he holds, cannot be effectively abolished by any prescription or privilege to the contrary—bases it upon the fact that the municipal magistrates really conduct their administration as public officials, nomine Imperantis (§§ 7–8 nn n and o). He also holds that an officer of a corporation can never be legally prevented from appealing to the Sovereign (c. 6, § 9).

51. Cf. n. c. 3, §§ 56sqq., and esp. § 64 n. b. Privileges which run counter to the public good—such as a privilegium senatus datum de non reddendis rationibus de bonis civitatum, or again a monopoly—are absolutely void. Privileges which may become prejudicial in altered circumstances, as so many of the privilegia collegiorum readily may, are subject to recall.

52. Cf. n. 46 supra, and see also n. c. 10 (esp. §§ 7 and 17–18) on the ius Imperantis circa adiutoria [i.e. in regard to res nullius]. But he defends himself against the reproach that he is depriving towns of the ownership of their property by his arguments (c. 6, § 8 n. a, n. c. 3, § 5 n. c).

53. Introit in ius publicum c. 2, §§ 9–10. In the following section (11) he argues acutely that on this basis international law is neither ius publicum nor ius privatum, inasmuch as actiones gentium fall into neither of the two categories [i.e. that of 'public' and that of 'private' actions] which are required by the conception of the State, but are simply liberae. [On Boehmer's argument the actions of States when regarded as powers or gentes in the international system (or want of system) are neither private actions, done by private citizens or private bodies or the prince in his private capacity, nor public actions, done by citizens in their public capacity or the prince in his capacity of a public person. They are liberae, or indeterminate. So Boehmer seems to argue, but it is difficult to see why the actio of a gens, if the act is really that of the gens (and not, for example, that of a casual pirate in the West Indies, of English nationality, who happens to plunder a French ship), should not be regarded as an act of the Princeps qua talis, or of citizens qua membra Republicae. We can hardly say that the gens is not the State. But the use of the separate word gens in international law (like the use of the word 'power') has led to a divorce between the theory of international and that of internal relations, which is only slowly being abolished.]

54. He deals (ii, cc. 4 and 5) with (1) the ius imperantium circa collegia et universitates and (2) their ius circa sacra. In dealing with the former subject, he refuses to allow that 'public colleges' have anything more than the status of 'private colleges' when regarded in their nature as universitates and compared with the Sovereign (e.g. they have not jura Republicae, as he has, but only jura collegiorum; they have not a ius fisci, as he has, and so forth). They are only suo modo publica ['public—in a way of their own'] in virtue of the Ruler having greater rights over them and their property than he has over individuals and their property. [In other words, they are public in the sense of being under public control, but not in the sense of having a public position.] Cf. n. c. 3, § 5 n. c.

55. Jus publicum, as Titus uses the term, includes only the relations of the Imperans, as such, to his subjects.

56. Cf. e.g. Daries, §§ 661–3.

57. In the second book of his De iure civitatis, which is devoted to the rights of the subject, Huber proceeds—after dealing first with persons in general (s. 1, c. 1), then with the family (s. 1, cc. 2–6), and then with citizens (Bürger) and the differences among them (s. 2)—to treat, in sect. 3, De iure universitatum. Under this head he discusses the universitas in genere (c. 1), guilds and trading companies (c. 2), universities (c. 3), religious societies (c. 4), local privileges

Their

Boehmer
on public and private law

On 'public colleges'

Huber's classification of universities

communities (c. 5), the responsibility of singuli ex facto universitatis (c. 6); and the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic church (c. 7). He follows a similar order in Instit. Rep. sect. II.

58. De jure civ. II, 3, c. 1, §§3 and 19. He remarks, however, that the name of societas is often given to bodies quae maxime sunt universitates, and he cites the East India Companies in Holland as examples.

Their definition and their powers

59. De jure civ. II, 3, c. 1, §§10-14, 24. Huber's full definition of the universitas is coetus sive corpus subditorum aliquius civitatis, sub certo regime, permissu summae potestatis, ad utilitatem communem societas. The regimen of a universitas may be conceded (as it is in the State itself) to one or more persons, or to the majority of the members (§20), but the concession must always be limited [as regards 'universities' other than the State] to the narrowest scope of action that necessity will permit, in order that the power of the State may be weakened as little as possible (§34). Universitates prohibitas, even when they are actually tolerated, exist only de facto, and not de jure, but a period of toleration has the effect of tacit approbation (§§26-30). Associations which are not for the real benefit of the socii or the State are to be suppressed (§§31-3).

Their authority derived from the State

60. Huber, De jure civ. II, 3, c. 6, §§9 and 19-20 potestas rectorum universitatis pendet a tenore mandati quod habent a summa potestate, a qua jus suum habet universitas. The rectors do not 'represent' the universitas: they have no praefectura other than what is derived from the Sovereign: quod agent, non ad mandatum populi, sed Principis, exigendum est.

He uses similar language in Prael. Dig. III, 4, no. 4. universitates republicae subordinatae cannot appoint permanent representatives, because they are unable modum et finem potestatis concedere suis rectoribus, sed...quidquid habent juris id accipiunt ab eo penes quem est summa potestas; prouide qua id genus universitatis praeuersum, non repreäsentant populum universitatis, sed potestalem sumnam cui parent. Corporations may therefore give an authorisation in a particular matter of legal action, which has a binding effect on those who consent, but they cannot vest their officers with a general power of binding the whole corporation (which explains, inter alia, the lex 'Curtas'), cf. De jure civ. II, 3, c. 6, §§3sqq and Prael. III, 4, no. 4. Nor can corporations devolve on their officers a jus contribuendi (De jure civ. II, 3, c. 6, §18), or a jurisdiction (ibid. §21), for any jurisdiction that they have is derived from the State (ibid. III, 1, c. 6, §8). Finally, they can only make by-laws if they are authorised to that effect, and subject to the sovereign's right of giving his sanction (ibid. I, 3, c. 6, §§59sqq., II, 3, c. 2, §§25sqq., III, 1, c. 2, §§14-17).

Schmier's theory of corporations

61. Schmier, Juris publ. univ. V, c. 1, nos. 87-114, where, after an account of the universitas in general, there is a discussion of local communities, universities, guilds and trading companies. Schmier expressly bases the requirement of State-concession on the ground that regimen, imperium seu jurisdiction ad universitatem constitutandam necessaria requit ex alio fonte quam summa potestatis largitate in inferiores derivari (no 92). When he comes to details, he makes a grant by the State the source of the corporation's right of choosing officers, administering property, imposing taxes, exercising jurisdiction, and generally enjoying autonomy and self-government, cf. V, c. 2, nos. 53-64, and also c. 3, nos. 69-79.

62. Ibid. III, c. 3, no. 20.

Similar theories

63. Cf. e.g. Krettmayr, Grundriss, §19. Subjects may form 'particular societies', but such societies enjoy jura communia only in virtue of the assent of the State, and they are thus subject to a jus supremas inspectionis et directionis on the part of the territorial prince. We may also note that even Pufendorf's ideas, and still more those of Hert, are partially in agreement with this trend in the natural-law theory of society.

64. See n. 6, supra.

65. Instit §§838-9. Wolff adds, in §849, that it is only societies whose objects are inadmissible which give rise to no rights and duties.

66. Instit §846. The laws of a society are prescriptions relating to matters 'which must always be done in one way, and that only, if the purpose of the society is to be secured'. 'All societies, therefore, must have laws, and enjoy the right to make laws' they have also the right of threatening punishment and of actually punishing offenders. Each new member promises, expressly or tacitly, that he will observe the laws, but since the laws of a society retain their authority by virtue of the consent of its members, the society has the power of abrogating or amending its laws, or of making new laws. Cf. §853.

67. Wolff finds a justification for requiring the Ruler's assent to the alienation of the property of a local community in the fact that it is incumbent upon him to see to the common interest, and, again, that he has a dominium eminens over such property—as indeed he has over all kinds of property (Instit §1129).

68. S. Cocceji, Nov. syst. iv, §280 constitutur tale corpus consensu cf. §205, on the principle of par ratio as between all corpora et universitates and the State [i.e. what is true of the State is equally true, or no less likely to be true, of corporations].

69. Heiniccius, Elem. iur. nat. n., §§13-25. The basis of the State's authority over corporations is the natural-law principle that, while in every society 'the well-being of the society is the supreme law of its members', the 'utility' of the 'greater society' must take precedence, in a 'compound society', over that of the 'lesser societies' contained in it.

70. Daries, Instit. iurispr. univ. Praec. §§17-23, P spec. §§550-6, 674-8. He derives the existence of associations from the contract [by which they are formed], but he bases the authority [of the State] over corporations on the principle that in a 'compound society' the relation of the subordinata to the subordinans societas is like that of the socius to the societas, and therefore the interest of the 'greater society' takes precedence in the event of a clash of interests (§§554sqq.). He therefore includes among the jura majestatis the jus efficiendi ne societates partiales fini utilitatis civitatis sint impedito, and (consequent upon that right) the further right of legitimising as 'just' such societies as are compatible with the purpose of the State, and of abolishing others as 'unjust' (§§674sqq.).

71. Syst. nat. §§327-47. A similar view reappears in the Jurispr. pos. Nettelbladt's §899; but in §853 a distinction is drawn between (1) jura universitatis, theory of whether originaria or contracta, and (2) rights which belong to magistratus constituti in universitate ex concessione Superioris, and are therefore exercised by them in the name of the State, and not in virtue of their representing the universitas.

72. In his Syst. nat. Nettelbladt first classifies societies by their purposes (§348), and then proceeds to arrange them, by a variety of criteria, into naturales et non naturales (§349), simplices et compostae (§§350-1), perpetuae et temporariae (§352), licias et illicias (§353), and aequales et inaequales (§§354-61).

Wolff
on the inherent rights
of societies

Similar views in other German writers

Nettelbladt's
theory of associations

Their
classification

'Equal societies' possessing authority

The inherent rights of associations

The compound society

Public societies in the large sense

Colleges of magistrates

Public societies in the strict sense
Local communities

78. To the category of societas which are aequales and also (if only in cases of doubt) cum potestate, there belong both (1) collegia, or societas simplices plurim quam diuorum membrorum, and (2) corpora, or societas compositae, the members of which are themselves 'colleges' (§354). In these collegia and corpora there are present certain peculiarities—which do not, however, prevent their being included in the category of societas aequalis—such as a directorium societatis (§357), a peculare collegum reppresentativum (§358), and deputationes collegi for particular issues (§359).

74. Syst. nat. §361.

75. The jura socialia societatis which appear in Nettelbladt's theory are the admission and exclusion of members (§§364 sqq. and 407), the appointment of imperantes, directores and officiales (§367); the power of disposition in regard to their own assets (§407), the right of meeting and making decisions (§§374 sqq.), autonomy (§§398-9), a potestas judicandi in regard to the affairs of the society (§413), self-government, including the right of self-taxation (§407); and finally the right of disposing of the property of the society—though the property itself is [not an inherent right, as the right of disposing of it is, but] a jus societas contractionis (§396). Only as regards equal societies possessing potestas does Nettelbladt assign all these jura socialia societatis to the society itself. In the case of equal societies without potestas, they belong to a third party; in the case of unequal societies, they belong to the imperans or superior. On the other hand, he regards the ownership of the property of the society as belonging in case of doubt—even in the two latter sorts of society [the equal society without power, and the unequal society]—to the community itself, and not to the person who wields authority (§396).

76. In an earlier passage of his Systema naturale, where he is seeking to determine the nature of the societas composita, Nettelbladt deals with the inclusion of 'moral persons' in a higher unity as its 'members', but he draws attention to the facts (1) that it is not all the societies within a society which are members of it, and (2) that not every society whose members belong to other societies is a 'compound society' (§§350-1). He proceeds, in the same context, to distinguish between (1) the position of a corpus composed of collegia which have social objects of their own, and (2) the position of a collegium divided into mere 'deputations' or sections (§359). In a later passage, where he is dealing with the theory of membra civitatis, he treats in some detail of the position of 'moral persons' as members of the State (§§1588 and 1226-50).

77. Syst. nat. §§1227-30, where he includes among the 'public societies which are eminently such' collegia seu corpora ordinum and collegia optimatum, but not the collegia senatoria in a democracy.

78. Ibid. §§1231-4. On the other hand, these 'societies which are magistracies' [i.e. administrative or judicial Boards] may possess the jus magistratus itself [not as of right derived from the sovereign, but] either jure proprio or jure administratorio, and they may in addition acquire special privileges.

79. Ibid. §§1235-7. In this case [i.e. as regards 'public societies strictly so called'] the place of the jus magistratus is taken by a jus ad certas functiones, regimen reipublicae concernentes, obeundas absque corridenti potestate.

80. Ibid. §§1238-40. These universitas personarum [such as territorial communities] may be either ordinatae or inordinatae: they may, or may not, have magistrates of their own, and they may be governed either by a collegium or a persona. Circuli [the German Kreise, roughly analogous to our English counties] belong to this category, but 'circles' which are the member-States of a federation are themselves systemata Rerumpublicarum.

81. Ibid. §§ 1241–2, 1247, 1250. In any case of doubt, we can only regard the society itself as the 'Subject' or owner of this authority, but an individual, or a part of the society, may also be such a 'Subject' (§ 1245). Private societies

82. Ibid. §§ 1243, 1247, 1249–50. Nettelbladt does not go into any further details about the extent of State-control over corporations when he is dealing with Natural Law. It is from positive law, and from such law only, that he seeks e.g. to derive the limits upon the rights of local communities, churches and families to alienate property, Jurispr. pos. § 903. State-control of corporations

83. Ibid. §§ 1243–4.

84. Ibid. §§ 1245, 1248. It goes without saying that this argument refers primarily to the position of the evangelical church in Germany.

85. Achenwall, Jus Nat., Proleg §§ 82, 91–7, and n, §§ 28sqq. On this basis Achenwall too makes every contract between more than two persons for the formation of a society produce a jus sociale universorum in singulos (n, § 8), and he regards a societas aequalis as one in which this jus, or social authority, remains with the whole community, and nothing more than a praerogativa, or a praecipua obligatio (in any case nothing in the nature of an imperium), is vested in a single person or body of persons (n, §§ 22–31). Achenwall on the social authority of associations

86. Hoffbauer, Naturrecht, pp. 190sqq, where a distinction is drawn between 'essential' (immanenta) and 'incidental' (transvenia) rights of societies, and where 'social laws' and 'social authority' (in its three species of directorial, executive and inspectorial) are treated as being essentially involved in any contract for the formation of a society. Hoffbauer also speaks of societies as having officials of their own—but not, he adds, independently of the Ruler, and he differentiates 'equal societies' in which all the members must concur from 'unequal societies' in which there is not such general concurrence. The views of Hoffbauer

87. Ibid. p. 288. But Hoffbauer adds that these 'private societies' cannot employ any coercive authority to vindicate their rights against their members.

88. A. L. von Schlozer, Allg. Staatsrecht, p. 70, § 19, vñ. Schlozer cites as examples 'musical clubs' and 'the Church'.

89. W. von Humboldt, Idem, pp. 41sqq, 83, 113sqq, 115.

90. It is sufficient to refer to the way in which Mevius (Prodromus, v, § 19) eulogises 'subordinate societies' as the foundation and mainstay of the State. The most important task of politics, he urges, is concerned with bona familiarum and with corporum, collegorum, urbium formatio, the prosperity of civil society and that of its contained groups are mutually dependent on one another; and there must be a happy mean between the independence of corporate bodies and their subjugation to the political Whole. On the basis of these ideas he will not refuse liberty of meeting and association simpliciter, but only when there are causae publicae, curiae imperantium cōditae (v, § 26). We may also remember the views of Leibniz [cf. supra, n. 6]. Mevius in praise of groups

91. Montesquieu, it is true, regards the monarch as source of all authority, but he also believes that constitutional government, and therefore true monarchy, is impossible unless authority is diffused through canaux moyens, and thus made, as it were, to flow into a Delta of pouvoirs intermédiaires.

Montesquieu
on the need of intervening powers between the State and its subjects

Moser's eulogy of the old Germanic
Groups

subordonnés et dépendants. There is therefore need for the prerogatives des Seigneurs, du Clergé, de la Noblesse et des Villes, as well as for political bodies (i.e. parlements) to declare and preserve the laws (dépot des loix). Any destruction of these intervening powers must produce, if not a Republic, at any rate a despotism, as was shown, for example, in the case of Law's operations in France [1716-20] and in the conduct of Ferdinand of Arragon. See the Esprit des lois, II, c. 4, cf also III, c. 7, v, cc 9-11 (where Richelieu is criticised), VI, c. 1 and VIII, c. 6, and cf of the argument, in V, cc 14-16, that despotism, as distinguished from monarchy, is based on uniformity, equality, centralisation, and the lack of all qualifying and moderating elements.

92 We need only refer to the account which Moser gives in his Patriotische Phantasien of the struggle of towns and guilds and leagues for liberty (I, nos. 43, 53, 54), and to his glorification of the Hansa (I, no. 45, III, no. 49). In the course of this glorification he hazards the remark that if 'the towns and guilds and leagues' had won the day in their struggle with the territorial principality, there would be sitting to-day at Ratisbon, 'side by side with an insignificant Upper House' a united body of associated towns and communities for dealing with the laws' which their forefathers once imposed on all the world, and then 'it would not be Lord Clive, but a counsellor of Hamburg, who would be issuing his commands on the Ganges' (I, no. 43).

We may also note Moser's historical accounts of the glory and the decline of fraternities and guilds (I, nos. 2, 4, 7, 32, 48, 49, II, nos. 32-5), and, more especially, his disapproval of the attack made upon them by the Recess of the Imperial Diet of 1731 (particularly in regard to the obligations of honour* imposed by craft-guilds, I, no. 49). We may equally note his general derivation of the constitution of the [German] territory, or Land, from a union of the 'Fellowship' type between free proprietors of estates, followed by an analogous process of Fellowship-formation among manumitted serfs and freemen who were not proprietors. (In this last connection there are several passages in Moser which deserve notice, e.g. in III, no. 54, he refers to the institution, by lords of manors, of 'a mutual protection society and articles of fraternity' among the peasantry, who then institute 'articles as between themselves' for their own domestic concerns †. Again, in III, no. 66, he treats of 'the origin and advantage of what are called Hyen, Echten and Hoden' among free men who have not a plot of land of their own, cf p. 353, where he remarks that 'such a Hode was something in the nature of a guild chartered by the State, which could freely pass a rule about itself, and by such means maintain the rights of free men', cf also IV, nos. 69-4.)

Finally, we may also refer to Moser's account of the origin of territorial Estates from leagues and confederations, and of their development into a body which represented the whole territory as a Landschaft [or local Diet], IV, no. 51.

93 Ibid. II, no. 2 and III, no. 20 'every civil society, great or small', should 'properly be a legislature for itself', and should not form itself on a

* The German is Handwerkszunft. The guilds imposed standards of decent work. Hegel in his Philosophy of Law (§§249-54) speaks of society as assuming a moral character in corporations, and of the individual as having his 'honour' in and through his corporation.

† This may remind us of the 'frith-guilds' and the later 'frank-pledge' in our own

Moser on liberty of association

general plan or on philosophical theories. Cf also iv, no. 41 ('each Gau and Hof' [or, as we might say, each hundred and manor] had of old 'its own autonomy'), and iii, nos. 54, 66

94. For Möser's views in regard to towns, cf. i, nos. 43, 53, iii, no. 20 On towns, guilds and rural groups (every small town ought to have its own particular political constitution), and i, no. 39 (where he opposes the exemption of the servants of country-landowners from civic taxes). For his views about guilds, cf. i, nos. 2, 4, 48-9, ii, nos. 32-5, and as regards rural communities, cf. ii, no. 1 (on the sovereign right of each peasant community to exclude strangers and sojourners) and ii, no. 41, iii, nos. 43, 52-3

95. Cf. e.g. the proposals for the founding of a company for world-trade by the united towns of Germany (i, no. 43), the founding of a separate college of advocates [like our Inns of Court] with an exclusive corporate constitution (i, no. 50), the founding of a 'circle-association' for putting a stop to distilling in the event of a shortage in corn (i, no. 64), the starting of a company for conducting trade in corn on the Weser (i, no. 52), etc.

96. Loc. cit. iii, no. 20, p. 71.

97. J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, §§ 21-2, cf. nn. 37-40, supra

98. Pufendorf deals with corporate property in Elem. jurispr. univ. i, def. 5, §§ 5-6. Propria sunt non solum quae ad personas singulares pertinent, sed et quae ad personas morales conjunctas seu societas quae tales. Neither third parties, nor the members themselves when they are not 'conceived as the whole society', own any right in such common property. But in addition to common property of this description, which is in the plenum dominium of the society, a society may also possess property of another description, where the 'use' belongs to 'individual members' (singuli)—and indeed (Pufendorf adds) there are many cases of such property where the use is open also to extranei.

Pufendorf also deals (Elem. ii, def. 12, § 28, J. n. et g. VII, c. 2, § 22 and VIII, c. 6, § 13) with obligations incurred by a corpus in consequence of the legal transactions of its rector or coetus. He assumes, like Hobbes, that in such cases the corporate property is liable for the satisfaction of the claims of its members, but where the claims of third parties are concerned, he holds that the individual members are responsible, each of them pro rata—though if there be refusal to discharge a claim, each can be made responsible for the whole amount.

Finally, he deals with delicta universitatum (J. n. et g. VIII, c. 3, §§ 28-9, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 13, § 19). He expounds the usual theory, but he suggests that innocent individuals should not be included in any punishment, and that all punishment should cease with the disappearance of the persons who were concerned in any given delict. He justifies the latter suggestion on the ground that, though there are certain attributes, such as possessions or rights, which belong to the universitas per se, there are others, such as learning or moderation or courage, which cannot be ascribed to a universitas, nisi ex derivatione a singulis. To be deserving of punishment is an attribute of the second kind, for a universitas, 'as such', has no anumus merens poenam ['no intention deserving of punishment']. [Cf. Grotius, supra, n. 52 to § 15.]

99. This is the view we find in Thomasius, Treuer and Titius, cf. n. 131 to § 16.

100. Cf. pp. 121-3 supra. Gundling's dissertatio de universitate delinquentis (cited by him in his Jus nat. c. 36, §§ 23 and 26, in order to prove the impropriety of the punishment inflicted by Poland on the city of Thorn) belongs to the literature of criminal law, and can only be discussed in connection with it

Gundling's confusion of corporation and partnership

101 Cf. nn. 160 and 163 to § 16. Gundling, in dealing with the contractus societatis, or, as he calls it, 'mascopcy', and in treating of communio incidentes [i.e. 'quasi-society', as Wolff terms it, n. 163 infra], uses Roman law as the basis of his argument (Jus nat c. 23, §§ 61-3). But (1) he treats a society as being a single 'Subject' or owner of rights, and (2) he regards as contrary to Natural Law the positive-law rules which make it improper for a society to agree to exclude suits for the division of its common property, or which treat the death of its members as producing its dissolution (c. 25, § 23).

102. Cf. nn. 58 and 59 to this section cf. also Huber's Prael. Instit II, 1, no. 7 (civitas hominum societas, quae nec famula sit nec libera Respublica), and Dig III, 4, no. 1.

103. Dig III, 4, no. 1, XVII, 2, no. 2, De jure civ II, 3, c. 2, § 2

104. Thus a university is a Universitas, but gymnasia and elementary schools are not, because they have no regimen certum, De jure civ II, 3, c. 3, Dig III, 4, no. 2. In dealing with groups of the type of the local community (universitates familiarum), Huber treats vier which have no magistrates of their own as not being universitates, even though they have common property, and he takes the same view of provinces, when they have no separate constitution, with provincial Estates of their own, but are directly administered by a prefect (De jure civ II, 3, c. 5, nos. 4, 18-22, Dig III, 4, no. 2).

105. Collegia magistrorum are not universitates, for they do not possess a scopus et usus a summa republica diversus et coenitibus pecularis (De jure civ II, 3, c. 5, § 23).

106. This idea of a purely 'collective' (or 'bracket') Group-personality appears in Huber's theory of the res universitatis (Prael. Instit II, 1, nos. 4, 8), and of other forms of corporate property (De jure civ II, 3, c. 1, § 35). It also appears in his theory of the legal transactions of corporations, and more especially in his view of the obligations which a universitas can incur. Here, in the usual manner of his time, he refuses to recognise that a universitas can be bound by contract, except when omnes et singuli have given a formal assent, or when its representatives have been acting within the terms of a specific mandate. Otherwise, he confines the liability of a universitas to cases where it has profited by some transaction [i.e. where there has been a lucrum emergens], and he takes the general view that an obligatio universitatis entails a proportionate or 'limited' liability of all its members (as being the partes ex quibus totum componitur)—cf. De jure civ II, 3, c. 6, §§ 1-18, Dig III, 4, no. 4.

We find the same idea of a merely 'collective' Group-personality in Huber's theory of the delicts of a universitas (De jure civ II, 3, c. 1, §§ 39-43, c. 6, § 13, Dig III, 4, no. 5), and of its capacity for being represented in a suit at law (Dig III, 4, nos. 4, 6). A similar trend appears in his treatment of the validity of majority-decisions. While he derives it from the 'social' or partnership element in a universitas, on the ground that the principle may have been agreed upon beforehand [by each individual partner] in the society, he also limits its application strictly, and that on the very same ground—e.g. he holds that it is only the [individual] consententes and their heirs who ought to incur liability in virtue of an obligation [arising from a majority-decision] (De jure civ II, 3, c. 6, §§ 23-4).

Huber emphasises, again and again, the identification of the 'collective

Huber's use of the term universitas

His Collective view of corporations

person' with the sum of the members. Ipsa universitas est persona (ibid c 1, § 36) ipsum corpus sociorum est universitas, non forma coniunctionis, ut aliqui arguantur (Instit II, 1, no 7)

107. See n 60 to this section. Huber accordingly refuses to recognise any real autonomy of a society (Instit I, 2, §§ 5, 12). It is not, of course, inconsistent with this that he should regard it as possible for a universitas (like any individual subject of a State) to possess not only dominium, but also imperium, outside the State. He concludes, however, that [though this is possible] it is not really the case with the Societas Indica [the Dutch East India Company], for the Company only exercises an imperium belonging to the United Provinces. De jure civi II, 3, c 2, §§ 14–21, cf also § 29

108. The only distinction which Huber draws between societas and collegia—bodies which he regards as in other respects very similar to one another—is that the majority-principle is the rule in the latter, and the exception in the former. If, therefore, the rule of the majority is introduced into it by an agreement among its members to that effect, a societas is thereby transformed into a corporation. It is thus that societas are often raised to the position of universitas (iure universitatis donantur): this is what happened to the Roman companies of tax-collectors, as it has also happened to modern colonial and trading companies, quae, quam primo fuerint Societas, deinceps in formam Collegiorum redactae sunt, nec aliter administrari possunt (De jure civi II, 3, c 2, §§ 2–13, Dig XVII, 2, no 2)

109. Vide supra, n 60 to this section

110. A view like that of Huber appears in Schmier see n 61 supra, and compare what he has to say about the jura universitatis (Jurispr. publ. univ. v, c 2, nos 52–64) and the delicta universitatis (ibid III, c 2, nos 95–104) with his argument about the rights and duties of a universitas in regard to its members (ibid v, c 3, nos 69–86). In dealing with this last topic, he speaks of the members as being in a position of dependence which obliges them to render obedience and loyalty, but as having a corresponding claim on the society to promote their prosperity and to protect them, and he explains both the position and the claim by the fact that the authorities of the corporation sumnam Potestatem repreäsentant, atque in illius virtute et participatione mandata et judicia imponunt.

We may also note the fusion of a natural-law theory of societas with a Roman-law theory of corporations in Micraelius (I, c 7), Felwinger (pp 908–24), Knichen (Opus pol. I, c 5, th 1–15), and Krüttmayr (Grundriss, §§ 11, 19).

111. This result is already to be seen plainly in Huber. He expressly says that jus quo universitatis utiuntur est idem quod habent privatis (Dig III, 4, no 3), and he uses very plain language in enunciating the view that the inherent rights which a universitas can claim for itself are limited to matters connected with its possessions (causae patrimoniales) (cf De jure civi II, 3, c 1, § 38). When he deals with the public-law rights of a corporate body, he makes them belong not to the universitas itself, but to its officers as representing the public authority.

112. J H Bochmer, for example, uses the conception of the societas aequalis in order to justify the status of the collegium seu universitas as una persona moralis, and to prove the identity of this collective person through all the changes in its membership. He goes on to make this conception the basis of his theory of the possessions, the debts, and the legal transactions and

His view of the authority of corporate bodies

His view of the relation of partnerships and corporations

Schmier on the universitas and its members

The results of Huber's views

Bochmer bases the corporation on the societas aequalis

delicts of the universitas. indeed he makes it the basis of a general distinction between omnes conjunctum sumptu and singuli, which he uses again and again in connection with all these points (Introductio in ius publicum universitatis, P spec II, c. 4, § 1 n. 1, § 3 n. 1, c. 10, § 5 n. pp)

113. See pp. 171-3, supra

114. See, as representing this whole line of thought, Nettelbladt, Syst. nat §§ 1238-40 and Hoffbauer, p. 288.

115. Montesquieu, on the other hand, while he takes an 'institutional' view of corporations, champions their cause, cf. n. 91 to this section

116. This is the case with Turgot (n. 15 to this section), and the same failure to distinguish between corporations and foundations appears in the debates of the National Assembly (see nn. 20-3 to this section). We may also trace an unconscious transition from the idea of a society as being an association to the idea of it as being a State-institution or foundation in the theory of Scheidemantel—and this notwithstanding the fact that he interprets all groups as 'associations' (without seeking to distinguish between societas and corporation), and that he bases all the rights and duties of groups on a contract between their members. cf. III, pp. 244 sqq.

117. See above, pp. 168-9

118. This is particularly the case with W. von Humboldt, Ideas, p. 129

119. See n. 128 to § 16. In particular, we find Huber expressly arguing that vicini without magistrates of their own cannot be universitates, even when they have res communes, et eorum nomine agere et convenire possunt ut personae, for these rights, he contends, may be exercised wherever there is simple co-ownership [i.e. the co-owners may act and meet in respect of what they own], whether or no there is also a societas (De jure civitatis II, 3, c. 5, § 4). [Just as he allows some rights of acting and meeting to a village which is not a universitas, so] Huber would also allow merely tolerated societies (e.g. Anabaptists and Arminians) to enjoy the rights which are necessary for their continued existence, although they are not universitates e.g. they should have the right of entering into contracts, though not that of receiving legacies (ibid. III, cc. 8-9, Dig. III, 4, no. 3)

120. See nn. 154, 162 and 165 to § 16

121. See nn. 155, 166 and 167 to § 16

122. On the extension of the conception of the 'collective person' in Hert and Gundling, see nn. 160 and 163 to § 16. It is also instructive to notice the line taken by Huber, when he is seeking to find the differentialia of societas, as contrasted with universitas (This is a task which he essays in the course of an exposition of the contractus societas—an exposition which is made to include a theory of the partnership in property between husband and wife, under the name of societas conjugans). He entirely avoids the pit-fall of making the differentialia consist in the absence of moral personality. See Dig. 17, 2, nos. 2-13, and see also nn. 108 and 119 to § 16.

Boehmer, too, [makes no sharp distinction between universitas and societas, he] distinguishes a universitas from a societas negotiorum only by the fact that it is not instituted ad communem lucrum et quaestum, cf. P spec II, c. 4, § 1 n. 1. Scheidemantel, in much the same way, applies the conception of the 'composite' person to families and partnerships also [as well as to corporations proper], III, pp. 244 sqq.

123. The fundamental ideas [of this Fellowship theory] were expressed in England by Locke, II, c. 8, §§ 95-9

The corporation confused with the foundation

Huber recognises bodies which are not universitates as moral persons

Extension of the connotation of the moral person

124. The fact that he even manages to establish a relation of this order between 'natural' and 'positive' feudal law shows how far Nettelbladt could go in this direction

125 Cf supra, pp 124-6sqq, and nn 170sqq to §16 Nettelbladt accordingly makes the distinction between the status internus of a society and its status externus (§334) the fundamental basis of his theory of corporations Achenwall goes even further in drawing a hard and fast distinction between the internum jus of a society (ii, §§6-13) and its externum jus (ibid. §§14-22) in the one case [i.e. as regards internum jus], he only employs the idea of a nexus iuridicus socialis. in the other, he uses that of a persona groups moralis

126 See nn 65-70 to this section, and also nn. 75, 81 and 85-6

127 Wolff, Instit §§841, 846, Heiniccius, §14, Coccej, §280, Daries, §762, Nettelbladt, §§336sqq, Achenwall, ii, §§24sqq, C. von Schlozer, De iure suff §3; Hoffbauer, pp 187, 192

128 Cf nn 175, 178, 181 to §16

129. Wolff, Instit §§979sqq, Nettelbladt, §§338-9, Achenwall, ii, §§32-9, Hoffbauer, pp 192-3 and 205sqq

130 The argument of Achenwall deserves special notice in this connection (ii, §§24-8) All the members of a societas aequalis have identically the same ius ac obligatio therefore the 'common consent of the members' must determine the means which are necessary for achieving the end of this society, and where this common consent has not been given and declared in the original pact itself, it has to be expressed in conclusa formulated subsequently to the pact. Inasmuch, however, as all the members cannot always assemble and give their consent to these later conclusa, an agreement (lex societas pactua) is made at the time of the initial institution of the society, determining the proper procedure to be followed in the future the modus consentendi validus thus comes to be fixed in advance, the rules of precedence which may have to be followed, and the method of counting a majority of votes, are agreed upon, etc. A similar argument appears in Wolff, Instit §§841sqq (on the methods of 'common consent'), Nettelbladt, §§374sqq, Hoffbauer, pp 199sqq.

131 Nettelbladt, §§363-6 The reception of new members is an act whereby the societas, in virtue of the jus societas sociale, declares that an extraeus who desires to be a member is thenceforth to count as such. It is an act which alters status [i.e. the existing system of relations in the society], and therefore modifies rights and duties [for all the old members], to an extent determined by the purpose of the society [e.g. the higher the purpose, the greater will be the change which an increase of the number of members makes in the existing system of relations and the existing rights and duties of members]. No particular rules can be laid down in regard to the quality and quantity proper to the members of a society, all that is needed is voluntas recipiendi and voluntas societas recipientis, the contract [by which a new member is received] is a valid contract even when, as is the case among the freemasons, the candidate does not know the exact object of the society, but knows that it is a permissible object. Cf. Wolff, Instit §§836-7 and 846, and cf. also the views of S. Coccej (iii, §105) on the status collegi [the system of relations existing in an association] which regulates participation in corporate rights, and on the actio prajudicialis which members have given them for the protection of such rights.

Distinction of the internal and the external position of

Achenwall on the basis of majority-decisions

The reception of new members into a society

Expulsion or resignation from a society

182 Logically enough, Nettelbladt refuses to recognise either a right of the member to quit a society freely, or a right of the society to expel a member by its own exclusive action, and he will only allow exceptions to be made in either respect in jura necessaria ob collisionem officiorum ['under duress of the law of necessity, in cases where there is a conflict of duties'], cf. §§368-70 and Jurispr. pos. §855. Hoffbauer takes the same line, pp. 198-9.

Wolff, on the other hand, is willing to allow a member to quit a society if there is no agreement to the contrary, provided that it is not to the detriment of the society, indeed, he is even willing to allow it—provided that an idoneus is substituted—in cases where there is an express agreement that a member shall not quit a society without its assent. Conversely, he holds that a society has always the right to expel a negligent or hostile member (§§852-3). Heineccius holds that any societas lasts only as long as there is consensus, and a member is therefore always free to quit (ii, §14). According to Achenwall (ii, §§12-13), a universitas has the right and duty to coerce or expel a member who offends against the agreement on which it is based, and, conversely, members have a right of coercion or resignation as against a universitas which adversely affects their rights.

183 Nettelbladt, §§362, 367, 371. See also his Jurispr. pos. (§§856-9 and 876) on the rights and duties of the officials of an association in positive law, on the responsibility which officials incur in consequence of their admnistratio, and, more particularly, on the position of the syndicus of an association.

184 Nettelbladt, §§83 and 372, and Jurispr. pos. §§846 and 865. Heineccius takes the same view, ii, §§20-1, and so does Achenwall (Proleg. §93)—with a reservation, however, in favour of those exceptions to the general rule [that corporations have the same rights as individuals] which arise from the diversa hominis individua et societatis natura.

Analysis of Nettelbladt's method of dealing with associations

185 Under the head of jurisprudentia naturalis generalis socialis, Nettelbladt treats first of the generalissimum de societatis principia—of the general conception of associations, and their origin, end, status, authority, kinds and members (§§326-71). He then deals with the application to societates of the rules of Natural Law which relate to singuli, discussing such application in detail with reference to actiones, res, leges, negotia, jura, obligaciones, possessio vel quan, and remedii juris (§§372-414).

Under the head of jurisprudentia positiva generalis (Jurispr. pos. Book ii), he begins by remarking (§846) that the rules which have been previously stated with regard to singuli (Book i, §§5-845) are also applicable to societates personarum. He then proceeds to treat of universitates personarum in general (sect. 1)—dealing with their different species (tit. 1), with their potestas, directorium and officia, and, more especially, their manera (tit. 2), and with their membership (tit. 3). Next, he treats (in a somewhat different order from that followed in his treatise on Natural Law) of the application to universitates of the positive-law rules relating to singuli. Here he deals first (sect. 2) with the theory of persons (tit. 1), things (tit. 2) and actions (tit. 3), he then deals (sect. 3) with leges et actus iuridici, he proceeds (sect. 4) to obligatio (tit. 1), jura (tit. 2) and possessio (tit. 3), and he finally deals (in sect. 5) with remedii juris.

Achenwall (ii, §§16-21) also draws a parallel between Natural Law in regard to 'societies' and Natural Law relating to individuals, distinguishing, in both cases, between three sorts of rights and duties—the absolute, the hypothetical, and those which arise from laesio.

186. Syst. nat. §373, Jurispr. pos. §866 A similar argument appears in Achenwall (II, §24) and Hoffbauer, pp. 192sqq

187 Syst. nat. §§374-92 Nettelbladt discusses under this head (1) meetings, which may be either 'stated' or specially summoned, and either direct or representative, (2) jura directoria (e.g. the summoning of meetings, the making of proposals, the collecting of votes and the formulating of resolutions), (3) votes and their different species (e.g. voting by heads and voting by curiae), (4) the right of voting, which belongs to all equally in any case of doubt, but lapses for the time being when a member abstains from voting or is absent in spite of having been duly summoned, and does not exist at all when the issue in question affects a member personally, (5) the order of voting, and the right to alter a vote given before a decision is finally taken, (6) the counting or weighing of votes, (7) the method of counting, (8) the formulation of decisions, (9) unanimity of votes, majority of votes, and equality of votes (in the last event, he remarks, nihil conclusum est, but the use of the lot eventually decides the issue), (10) the majority-principle (which is satisfied by a relative majority), and the exceptions to that principle, (11) suo in partes [or the taking of a division], and, more especially, the decision of the question whether an issue is really present which is suitable for settlement by that method, and (12) the cancelling of a decision. He expressly remarks that all the rules suggested are equally valid for the decisions of a representative body or for those of a collegiate body of officials.

188 Jurispr. pos. §869 Nettelbladt also mentions the requirement that all should be summoned, and at least two-thirds should be present, the greater weight which is sometimes recognised as due to sanioritas [i.e. to the sanior, as distinct from the major, pari], the calculus Minervae, §867 [what we should call the 'casting vote'], the continuance of the right to vote in spite of non usus, and the validity of a vote in one's own favour (a principle to be assumed in Germany on the analogy of canon law), §868. He also treats in detail of corporate seals (§870) and the proper proofs of voluntas et consensu (§871).

189 Cf Wolff (§§841-5), who even deduces from Natural Law the principle that where the contributions or benefits of the members are unequal, their voting power should be unequal, and proportionate to what they give or receive. See also Daries, §763, along with §§750-62, Achenwall, II, §§26-8 (where, however, the reader is referred to leges conventae [i.e. positive law] for most of the particular questions raised), and Hoffbauer, pp. 199-204. Christian von Schlozer (De iure suffr. §§8-23) also seeks to derive the rules of corporate action from Natural Law, but he holds that Natural Law does not warrant either the principle of majority-decision, or the binding of those who are absent by the vote of those who are present. He thinks that, if the idea of the societas aequalis is to be preserved, an agreement must be attained by means of pacta adjecta [i.e. positive rules super-added to Natural Law] before there can be any validity attached to the act of a majority, whether the majority be the ordinary form of majority (which in any case of doubt must be absolute, and not relative) or some specially qualified form. The same is true in regard to casting votes, in regard to the obligation incurred by absent members (here there should also be further rules both about the competence of those present to take a decision and about the giving of votes by letter or by proxy), in regard to voting, for reasons of equity, by curiae or classes, and, finally, in regard to jus cundi in partes and usus suffragiorum sibi.

Nettelbladt's account of the deliberations and decisions of corporate bodies

His account of the rules of positive law in these matters

Other writers on the rules of voting

inuncem adversantium [i.e. the right of claiming a division, and the general methods of getting some sort of unity out of a number of conflicting views on an issue]

140. Cf. n. 184 to §16, and the following notes.

141. See Nettelbladt, §§388-9 (where it is argued that there can be no majority-vote in causis iura singulorum concernentibus), and §392 (where it is contended that decisions from which jura quaesita have subsequently arisen cannot be abrogated). Similarly Hoffbauer holds (p. 204) that a majority has no power to touch the rights which a member enjoys in the society (and therefore no power to touch the constitution), or even to touch any rights of a member derived from any other source. C. von Schlozer contends that where pure natural law is followed—and where, accordingly, there is neither any majority-vote nor any obligation of the absent by the vote of those present—no question arises of [the majority modifying] the jura singulorum or the leges fundamentales (loc. cit. §13), and even where the validity of the majority-principle has been agreed upon by additional contracts [supplementary to the original contract constituting the society], the facta fundamentalia and the jura singulorum are exempt from the operation of these contracts, and can only be altered by a novum pactum [in substitution for the original contract constituting the society].

142. Syst. nat. §§393-6, cf. Wolff, §§197 and 1128-9 (where it is further suggested, in regard to the possessions of a community, that they belong to 'the descendants' also).⁴ and Achenwall, II, §19

143. Jurispr. pos. §§872-7 (where he deals especially with the legal questions of salarium, the 'year of grace' [i.e. a year's revenue granted to the family of an official at his death], family-property, and the administratio bonorum)

144. Syst. nat. §398. The same line is taken by Wolff, §846 (see n. 66 to this section), and by Achenwall. The latter argues in II, §§29-30, that all the leges of the 'equal society' are leges conventionales, to which new members tacitly submit, but it is only ut singuli that the members are bound by these laws, and ut universi they are supra leges, and can alter them at pleasure. In the same way he also argues (loc. cit. §34) that in the 'unequal society' the imperans promulgates laws by which he is not himself bound, and which he can alter at will. But even in the 'unequal society' the leges fundamentales [as distinct from ordinary laws] are always to be regarded as facta [and are therefore unalterable except by the consent of both parties to the pact], cf. Nettelbladt, §399, and Achenwall, §35

145. Jurispr. §§884-91 (where he also treats of conflict of by-laws, their relation to common law, and their interpretation and application).

146. Syst. nat. §§400-2. He pays particular attention to the contracts into which the Superior can legitimately enter societatis nomine, limites suae potestatis non transgrediendo, but he holds that in 'equal societies' which possess potestas it is only a decision of the society itself which can authorise such contracts

147. Syst. nat. §§404-5, where Nettelbladt argues that the 'obligations of individuals' are the duty of obedience and the duty of accepting office in the society, and that 'obligations of the society' [as distinct from those of individuals] arise from undertakings given by representatives, from versio in rem ipsius societatis,⁵ from the acts of a mandatarius legitimus acting within the

* I.e. Wolff recognises not only (1) the present society and (2) the present singula membra, but also (3) 'the descendants', as having rights in the possessions of a community.

† See n. 151 to §17 supra limits of his powers, and from actio societas. A similar argument appears in his Jurispr pos §§893-4. In §898 he also deals with the non-admissibility [as regards societies] (a) of the principle of compensation as between stationes fisci [the different 'accounts' in the common fund?] and (b) of the principle of restitutio in integrum [the rescinding of an act by an official, in order to prevent the legal consequences which ordinarily attend such an act from taking effect].*

148 Jurispr pos §§895-7 He adds that a member is never responsible for another member, nor is a successor in universitate, unless he has an obligation ad haereditatem.

149 Ibid. §877 He also remarks, in the preceding section, that a universitas, as a 'moral person', cannot administer its own property itself

150. Achenwall (ii, §21) holds that a societas, as such, is capable of all obligations—both the 'absolute' and the 'hypothetical', and both the hypothetical arising from permissible and the hypothetical arising from non-permissible actions. Scheidemantel only remarks (i, p. 220) that 'penalties attached to whole communities should only affect the benefits which arise from the particular nexus of the given society'.

151 Syst nat §§406-7 He enumerates as jura societatis (in contradistinction to jura singulorum) the following: (1) the admission of members, (2) the expulsion of members, (3) the disposition of the res societatis, (4) the making of provision for the negotia societatis, (5) the imposing of contributions for the attainment of the society's objects, including contributions from the res et facta singulorum, (6) dispositio de ipsius juris societibus [ipsius juribus societatis?], even if such disposition be to the advantage or disadvantage of individual members and even if it takes the form of self-limitation or renunciation (e.g. that of renouncing a jus prohibendi).

Nettelbladt
on jura
societatis

152 Jurispr pos §§899-903 Such peculiarities in the rights and duties of societies include privileges or charters, acquisition by pollentatio, the loss [of property] after the lapse of 100 years, or by destruction, and limitations on the power of alienation

153 Syst nat §§408-9, and also §§293 sqq.

154 Jurispr pos §§904 and 906 (which treat of interdicts [or, as we might say, 'injunctions'] and the peculiarities of fiscal law in regard to 'societies')

On possession
by societies

155 Loc cit §905 As regards jura affirmativa, possession of such rights is acquired [by other parties, as against a universitas] through toleration by the universitas itself, and not through toleration by individual members, while, conversely, the acquisition of possession by a universitas [as against other parties] can only be defeated by a stoppage of the proceedings of the universitas ipsa. As regards jura negativa, possession of such rights is acquired [again by other parties, as against a universitas] through prohibition addressed to the universitas and the acquiescence of the universitas ipsa, while, conversely, the acquisition of possession by a universitas can only be defeated, once more, by a stoppage of the proceedings of the tota universitas and the acquiescence of all its members therein

On legal remedies
of societies

156. Syst nat §§410-12 and Jurispr pos §§908-9 (reprisals, Nettelbladt argues, are not only permissible between States they are also permissible, in a peculiar way, between Churches, but other universitates have no more right in this respect than belongs to individual subjects).

* The argument appears to be that ordinary societies do not enjoy the benefit of these principles, while the 'great society' of the State does

157. Syst. nat. §413. the jurisdiction of a society is no proper jurisdiction, such as that which universally appertains to States it is rather a conventionalis potestas judicandi

158. Syst. nat. §414 (which deals with the processes of actio, exceptio and provocatio) In his Jurispr. pos. §§878-82, Nettelbladt deals more fully with the modes of legal action open to universitas. He draws a distinction between cases in which the causa universitatis qua talis is 'divisible', and those in which it is 'indivisible'. In cases of the first sort, the members (singuli) are in a position to make an effective disclaimer, though they are open to doubt as witnesses, but in cases of the second sort also they are not altogether free from suspicion as witnesses, and the distinction is thus really slight. A universitas should take an oath by means of three or four of its members. Nettelbladt also discusses the documentary evidence proper in such processes, and the proper proofs of descent in family-disputes.

In §911 he deals with the prior rights of a universitas in cases of concursus [i.e. of a conflict of claims]; and in §912 he treats of the conflict of claims arising when a universitas itself is involved in debt. In the latter case he holds that, inasmuch as the substance of the property is inalienable, there can only be a concursus anomalus, with a sequestration and division among the claimants of the income arising from the property.

159. Jurispr. pos. §846, cf. also Achenwall, II, §8

160. Cf. especially Wolff, §977, and Achenwall, Proleg. §94 and II, §§41-84 (with nn. 175 and 182 to §16 above); see also Cocceji, §281, Daries, §§606sqq., and Nettelbladt, Syst. nat. §§666sqq. (where he classifies six sorts of family 'society'—paterna, adoptiva, tutelaris, hereditis, domus, conjugalis), along with Jurispr. pos. §851.

On the other hand Hoffbauer, who treats marriage as an equal society which can be freely dissolved (pp. 209sqq.), considers that the relation of parents to children and servants is not a 'society' (pp. 214sqq.), and that the family is not a 'compound society' (p. 221).

161. In his Positive Jurisprudence Nettelbladt reckons as universitatis the German Empire, the Catholic and Evangelical Churches, local communities, corpora et collegia, and families (including gens, familia and domus), §§848-51. He treats the divisions of the family as membra universitatis, arguing that it is only special rules in regard to the acquisition or loss of members which distinguish such divisions from one another (§§860-62). He brings family-property (or bona stemmatica) which is in domino vel quasi domino familiae under the general head of res universitatis (§875), and he applies to its alienation (apart from a requirement that all the members of the family should give their consent) the general rules of Roman law in I, 3 C. de vend. reb. civ. (§903). He speaks of families as parties in civil suits (§882); and he refers to statuta familiarium [family by-laws or 'rules of the house'], which may be either facta, or dispositiones capitis familae, or normae Superioris (§886).

In his Syst. nat. he draws a distinction between (1) the rights of ruling families to the property of the 'House' or 'line', (2) the property-rights of the Fisc, and (3) the patrimonium Principis (§1349), and he also speaks of the autonomia familiarium illustrum (§1510).

162. See especially Nettelbladt, Syst. nat. §§358-9, on the application of the general rules relating to 'societies' to any peculiare collegium repraesentativum and to deputationes collegii, see also his Positive Jurisprudence, §850, on the division of corpora et collegia into (1) separata and (2) those which are only parts alterius universitatis

163. See, more especially, Wolff. He distinguishes, in his theory of common property, between three forms of communio (1) the communio negativa of the state of nature, (2) communio positive, with such and such shares for each participant, and (3) communio mixta, in which the property itself belongs to a universitas, and the individual has only a right of common user (Inst. §§191-7). He interprets, however, the second of these forms—that of positive co-ownership—as being 'like ownership by a single person', and all that he assigns to the individual participant, other than the right of disposition in regard to his share, is a right of annulling the unity of ownership 'if the common right be not enjoyed conformably to the condition that it must remain common' (§196 and §§330-1). We may compare with this his remarks on collective credits and debts (§44), on common citizenship of towns (§573), on societas negotiatoria (§§639-48, and especially §642, 'on the share of each member in the property of the society'), on communio incidentia or 'quasi-society' (§692), and, finally, on the 'nuptial contract' in regard to shares in mines (§683), which he surprisingly brings under the head of lottery-contracts (Glückverträge).

Nettelbladt not only assumes the existence of a single personality of many individuals when such individuals play the part of a 'moral person' coniunctum he also assumes its existence when they disiunctum unam personam sustinent, e.g. where it is a case of correi [i.e. persons severally responsible for the same debt], or of representatives and the persons they represent (Jurispr. pos. §§17-18). In his theory of communio positiva (Syst. nat. §§203-4), of communio dominium (§§222-5), and, more especially, of general and particular community of property (§§226-7), the [Teutonic] idea of 'the joint hand' makes its appearance—particularly in the fact that, while he ascribes the common property to all the members of a group taken as a whole, he also ascribes to each individual a quasi-private property in his share. In this last connection it is to be noted that he confines dominium proper to res corporales, but he regards a quasi-dominium in res incorporales as co-existing with dominium proper (§215) [Hence the share of an individual, being an 'ideal' or incorporeal thing, can only be the object of quasi-private property, but this quasi-private property coexists with the dominium proper of the whole group].

164. It has already been remarked that the parallel between the division of one individual into several 'persons' and the union of several individuals in one 'person' helped to turn into an abstraction the idea of a person composed of a number of individuals, cf. n. 173 to §16 supra.

165. Thus, for example, the whole of the theory regarding the authority of a community over its members is inapplicable to a society composed of two persons only, though such a society is none the less expressly recognised as a 'moral person', and the consequence is that the greater part of the general theory of societies is inapplicable in such a case. Cf. Achenwall, II, §8 (who remarks that, provided there are more than two members, the sum of the reciprocal rights and duties thus involved gives rise to a ius sociale universorum in singulos singulique cypuslibet in universo) cf. also Heiniccius, II, §14, and Nettelbladt, Syst. nat. §§84 and 333. Similarly we find thinkers compelled [by this general point of view which led them to make concessions to the rights of individuals] to accept as causes of the dissolution of a societas

Mere systems of co-ownership regarded as 'moral persons'

The group as merely so many individuals

the fact of the death of its members, or the disappearance of a member, or resignation, etc. Nettelbladt, §333.

Yet it exists apart from individuals

166. We may notice especially, for the light which it throws on this tendency, the way in which Nettelbladt (loc. cit. §86) seeks to justify his assumption that the 'moral personality' of a societas can persist in a single member, or even without any member, if there be ground for expecting its reconstruction. essentia enim personae moralis consistit in individuum consociatione, et si adhuc superest unum individuum, id repraesentat reliqua; si vero nullum actu adest, quae in spe sunt individua pluralitatem individuum constituant. We may also note the interpretation of community-property in Wolff, cf. n. 142 to this section.

167. Cf. nn. 114 and 130 to this section, and also nn. 176 and 181 to §16

168. Cf. supra, pp. 179-180

169. Cf. especially the views of A. L. and C. von Schlözer, and of Hoffbauer, as stated in nn. 186-92 to §16

170. Humboldt's Ideen, pp. 121, 123sqq., 125, 129. 'The less a man is enabled to act otherwise than as his will desires or his force allows him, the more favourable is his position in the State.'

171. Ibid. pp. 129-32

172. Cf. Pufendorf, Elem. §§24-6 and J. n. et g. II, c. 3, §23, Gundling, c. 1, §54; Hertius, II, 3, pp. 21sqq., Huber, I, 1, c. 5, J. H. Bochmer, Jus pub. univ., P. gen. c. 2, §§3-7, P. spec. I, c. 3, §22 n. 1. Justi also argues (§§222-3) that international law does not depend on the existence of a social union of States or a joint federal State. It is rather that a state of nature exists between different nations, and that they live in that state, like individuals, by their own will, without any association, in perfect liberty and equality. But they live on the same globe, they are therefore subject to the fundamental rule that they must do as they would be done by, and there thus exist among them duties of good-fellowship—though there is no society. Cf. also Spinoza, Tract. pol. c. 3, §§11-18, and Horn, De civ. c. 2, §§4-9.

Denial of any international society

173. Mevius, Prodromus, §§5-9 and 18-20 the societas communis inter omnes populos is the source of international law, and the authority of that law depends, not on any agreement, but on the rational order which holds good for this societas populorum conjunctio. Cf. also Johannes a Felde, I, c. 1, p. 5, Praschus, §3, Placcius, Bk. III, Leibniz, Introduction to Cod. Gent. dipl. I, §13, Fragment on Natural Law, p. 420, and Caesar-Furst cc. 31-2, Bossuet, I, art. 5.

Admission of such a society

174. Thomasius, Instit. iur. div. I, c. 2, §§101-4, III, c. 1, §§38-56. He censures the Aristotelians for neglecting the societas gentium; he proves its existence (qua universum genus humanum natura est unum ad certum finem), and he describes it as a societas maxime naturalis, which produces a juris communio. But international law proper is in his view only a part of the lex divina naturalis discoverable by human reason; it is not a jus humanum, or system of positive law. For (1) there is no Superior, (2) contracts only oblige men lege intercedente, just as custom only binds them by virtue of a tacita approbatio principis, and (3) the assumption of an express or tacit pactum universale is a mere fiction.

Thomasius on the societas gentium

175. Wolff, Instit. §§1090-2, Daries, §544 (where the societas universalis omnium hominum is treated as a societas necessaria), Nettelbladt, Syst. nat. §§1420sqq. (there is a societas natura constituta 'for the preservation of the human race'), Achenwall, Proleg. §§82-90, I, §§43-4, II, §§210-88 (on the societas universalis). In all these writers there is a general recognition that there is also such a thing as positive international law. Wolff, for example, speaks of a jus gentium voluntarium, pactum, and, to some extent, consuetudinum, and Nettelbladt admits leges [gentium] sociales seu systematicae as well as leges gentium stricte naturales.

The views of Wolff and his successors

176. Thomasius argues that the societas gentium is not a respublica universalis, but a societas aequalis with no imperium, and that, far from perfecting the State, it is imperfectior civitate (Instit. iur. div. III, c. 1, §§ 52–3, Fund. III, c. 6, § 5). The same line of thought appears in J. a. Felde, I, c. 1, p. 5, and Nettelbladt also remarks (§ 1420) that the society of peoples is a systema gentium rather than a civitas maxima.

177. Wolff, § 1090 Achenwall also uses this term (Proleg. §§ 82 sqq.), cf. Vico (p. 156), omnes orbis terrarum respublicae una civitas magna cuius Deus hominesque habent communem.

Kant finds the ideal goal of human progress in a World-State (Völkerstaat or 'World-Republic') with a definite cosmopolitan constitution and a single Head, but he holds that the only goal which can be attained under present conditions is the institution of a 'League' ('Federation' or 'Fellowship') for the prevention of war (Works, VI, pp. 340–6, 415–20, VII, pp. 162 and 168 sqq.).

Kant and Fichte on a league of nations

Fichte, who differs from all other writers on Natural Law in deriving international law not from the relations of States to one another, but from those of the individual citizens of different States, desires a voluntary 'League', which is not to be a Völkerstaat, but is to possess judicial and executive authority for producing a state of peace (Naturrecht, II, pp. 261 sqq., Works, III, pp. 379 sqq., Posthumous Works, II, pp. 644 sqq.).

178. Pufendorf, De systematibus civitatum, § 8, J. n. et g. VII, c. 5, § 16, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 8, § 13, Horn, De civ. II, c. 2, § 14, Beccmann, Med. c. 22, Huber, De civ. I, 2, c. 2, §§ 20 and 28, I, 3, c. 3, Thomasius, Instit. iur. div. III, c. 6, §§ 57–8, Schmier, I, c. 4, no. 67, Hertius, Elem. I, s. 12, §§ 7–8 and II, s. 18, Gundling, c. 37 (36), §§ 37–47, Titius, Spec. iur. publ. VII, c. 7, § 37, J. H. Bochmer, P. spec. I, c. 3, §§ 27–9, Daries, §§ 808–11, Achenwall, II, §§ 189–90, Heincke, I, c. 3, §§ 27–31, A. L. von Schlozer, p. 117, § 6.

179. Pufendorf, J. n. et g. VIII, c. 9, De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 17, Huber, III, 4, c. 3, Gundling, c. 12 (11), §§ 34–42 and also c. 24 (23), §§ 16–19 on 'Mascopoyen' [or 'contracts of society'] among nations, and on societas bellicae and common governments, Daries, §§ 802–5, Achenwall, II, §§ 240–2.

Thomasius (Instit. iur. div. III, c. 1, §§ 35–7 and c. 8, §§ 1–27) adopts a peculiar line of argument. He regards any federal association between a number of States, when it represents only a social form of uno voluntatum and is constituted for a limited period, as being a societas perfectior civitate, on the ground that it supplements in certain directions the power of a single State which is inadequate by itself. Such an association, he thinks, is indeed an 'arbitrary' community, but it marks an approach to societas naturalis. He draws, however, a sharp distinction between a societas inter plures respublicas confederatas and a systema civitatum: the former he regards as constituted only for a definite object (cetera utilitatis gratia), but the latter as a perpetua uno. indefinitae gratiae causa.

Thomasius
on federatio

180. Pufendorf, De syst. §§ 9–15 and J. n. et g. VII, c. 5, § 17, Huber, I, 2, c. 2, §§ 24–7, Daries, §§ 806–7.

181. Hert, for example, writing in 1689 (Elem. I, 12, § 5 and II, 17, §§ 1–5), already notes that unions under a single king are possible not only where there is no other bond of connection, but also when there is a considerable amount of community between the countries so united. Titius, writing in 1703, in his commentary on Pufendorf's De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 5, § 14, draws a sharp distinction between a mere personal union, sub uno capite, and a real union, in which there is also a common exercise nonnullarum imperii partum, and he holds that a systema exists in the latter case only, and not in the former. Treuer takes the same line, in his commentary on the same passage; cf. also Schmier, I, c. 4, nos. 68-76. The same view also appears in Heiniccius (1737), Elem. II, § 119 (but he was not, as Juraschek assumes (p. 13), the first to take this view). See also Nettelbladt, § 172, who adds the idea of [the union of] a predominant State with subsidiary States. Apart from these writers, we generally find the idea of unio per incorporationem expounded.

The theory of a 'real union' of States

The theory of the corpus confederatorum

182. Pufendorf, De syst. §§ 16sqq., J. n. et g. VII, c. 5, §§ 18sqq., De off. hom. et civ. II, c. 8, §§ 13sqq. there is unum corpus, but no civitas, for singulæ civitates summa in se imperium retinent, and they have only bound themselves contractually circa exercendum communis consensu unam aut alteram partem summa imperii: we cannot, therefore, ascribe to this category [of corpora confederatorum] a State composed ex pluribus corporibus subordinatis, or, again, a State which leaves some degree of independence to conquered provinces. Of Huber, I, 2, c. 2, §§ 20-3 the federal assembly non est omnium capitul, sed plura capita representat. non vere imperia, sed imperia singulorum communiter exercutur, the sovereignty of the members of the federation remains intact (I, 3, c. 3). See also Thomasius, Insti. iur. du. III, c. 6, §§ 57-8, where, however, the term composita res publica is used, Hertius, Elem. I, s. 12, §§ 7-8 and II, s. 18, and Gundling, c. 37 (36), §§ 37sqq. Schmier remarks that it is only an appearance of una res publica that is ever present: revera sunt et manent inter se distinctæ et diversæ, utpote voluntates res bonaqua sua secessu et separatione habentes (I, c. 4, nos. 77-88). Titius (Diss. § 76 and Jus publ. VII, c. 7, §§ 34-5) speaks of corpus civile ex pluribus civitatibus ita compositum, ut unaquaque civitas summa ac plenaria etiam plenum imperium habeat, sed ita limitatum, ut guardare ejus partes conjunctim ab omnibus sint exercendæ. See also J. H. Boehmer, P. spec. I, c. 3, §§ 27-9, Daries, §§ 808-11, Achenwall, II, § 190, Heincke, I, c. 3, §§ 27-31 (a systema civitatum, he holds, is a corpus morale which wears the appearance of a single State owing to the common exercise of the rights of sovereignty, it is a societas iuri naturali), Kreitmayr, § 4, A. L. von Schlozer, pp. 117-18 (what is in question, he thinks, is a 'civil society' or 'community' of States, but not a State).

Such a body cannot act by majority-decision

183. Pufendorf, De syst. §§ 17-21 and J. n. et g. VII, c. 5, §§ 19-21: it is necessary that there should be some meetings, and it is possible that there should be a permanent federal council, but the deputies attending the former continue to be ministri sociorum, while the latter (the concilium deputatorum) has only a 'delegated power', and its us et auctoritas provenit a sociis the majority-principle is inapplicable, since it means the presence of an imperium, and here every member has the right of secession. Horn takes a similar view, holding that everything has to be done ratione pacti et sociorum libertatum consensu (II, c. 2, § 14), and A. L. von Schlozer also considers that the use of a majority-vote is not possible in a federal Diet, and that, for this very reason, such a political system has no final judge and is devoid of responsibility (pp. 118-19).

Views to the contrary

184. Huber allows a certain amount of validity to majority-decisions (I, c. 3): the same view is taken by Hertius, in his notes to Pufendorf's J. n. et g.

vn, c 5, §20, and by Schmier, loc. cit. no. 88 J. H. Boehmer (i, c 2, §4), Achenwall (ii, §190), and Krettmayr (§4) regard the rules of societas aequalis as applicable to federations. Daries takes the same view (§§808–11); but he considers that a directorium, with a jurisdictio conventionalis between the members of the federation, is also possible.

185. Pufendorf, De rep. irreg., J. n. et g. vii, c 5, §§12–15 and 20, De off. hom. et civ. n. c. 8, §12 he regards any federal body in which the validity of the majority-principle is agreed upon as being a corpus irregulare. Gundling (loc. cit.) clings to the view that any such political system should be termed a monstrum. J. H. Boehmer (i, c. 3, §29), while he introduces the idea of the two possible origins of a federal system (it may be due to the negative fact of disintegration or devolution, as well as to the positive fact of foedus or integration), describes the 'irregular system' as pitiable.

186. Cf Otto's commentary on Pufendorf's De off. hom. et civ. n, c 8, §12 Hertius, i, s. 12, §§6–9 and n, s. 19, where formations intermediate between a federation and a State with provinces, such as the German Empire, are merely treated as being respublicae irregulares, in just the same way as ordinary unions and federations, Schmier, i, c 4, s 3, §§1–3, and Titius, vii, c 7, §§36–54. Titius, we may also note, applies to federal forms of the State the general distinction which he draws between States which are adstrictae and those which are laxae (cf. n. 167 to §17 above, and p. 155), and he accordingly includes the 'systems' (or curtales composite) which have been constituted by a foedus adstricatum under the head of adstrictae, and those which are due to the disintegration of a unitary State under that of laxae. See also Huber (i, 3, c 3, §§17–20), who admits that there are deviations from the general norm in the German Empire, and see also Krettmayr (§4), who tries to meet the difficulty by suggesting that side by side with the systema curtales foederatarum aequalis, such as is to be found in Switzerland and Holland, there may also exist an unequal system of federated States, like the political structure of Germany. A L von Schlozer also holds (p. 118) that 'scattered in a number of fragments, the 300 members of the giant body of Germany' only constitute a mere society [and not a State].

187. Caesarius-Fursterius, c 11, and Demonstr. pol. prop. 57. Leibniz, it is true, does not base himself upon Natural Law in defending the cause of federalism. On the one hand, comparing the difference between a confederatio and a unio with that between a societas and a collegium or corpus, he will only admit the emergence of a new persona civilis when there is a corporate group [and therefore he will not admit that there is such a persona in a confederatio, which is only a societas, and not a corporate group], on the other hand, he abandons the idea of sovereignty, holding that a real political authority of the Group-person, exercised over the member-persons, is compatible with the libertas et suprematus of these member-persons [It follows that Leibniz (1) from the first point of view, cannot apply the natural-law idea of the 'moral' or 'civil' personality of Groups to federations, and (2) from the second point of view, cannot apply the natural-law idea of the sovereignty of the State to federations, or indeed to any other form of State, since he has abandoned that idea in toto, cf. supra, n. 48 to §17, and cf. also n. 253 to §16. In dealing with federations, Leibniz is thus outside the ground of Natural Law, because he is unable to use either its idea of Group-personality or its idea of State-sovereignty.]

188. Esprit des Lois, ix, cc 1–3 In treating of the république fédérative,

Irregular or monstrous forms of federation

The problem of the Holy Roman Empire

Leibniz on federalism

Montesquieu
on federations

which he sometimes describes as état plus grand and sometimes as a société des sociétés, Montesquieu makes no definite distinction between the different forms which it may assume (cf. Brie, Der Bundesstaat, I, p. 31), but at any rate he leaves room, under this heading, for a real federal State. He regards the German Empire (which he describes in another passage—Bk x, c. 6—as a république fédérative mixte, with a Head who is en quelque façon le Magistrat de l'union et en quelque façon le Monarque) as being a more imperfect form than the federations in Switzerland and Holland, on the ground that monarchy is not so suitable for a federal constitution.

189. Syst. nat. §§ 1160, 1172-7, 1183, 1221-5, 1406-9. Hoffbauer is in agreement with him, pp. 314-15.

190. Syst. nat. §§ 1160, 1172, 1174, 1408. A respublica composta is present when diversas respublicas unam rempublicam, cuius potestatis civili subiectas sunt, constitutum, but the member-States are not sovereign, and therefore they are not, in external relations (though they are in relatione ad Rempublicam maiorem), independent gentes (i.e. 'persons' in international law).

191. A composite State may be a monarchy or a republic: so may also its respublicae minores (§ 1175). In such a State there is a duplex potestas civili—the summa and the subordinata, and the latter of these powers may, in turn, be exercised doubly—both by the member-States to the exclusion of the summa potestas [i.e. the federal authority] and by the member-States concurrently therewith (§ 1176). Similarly there is a duplex subiectio (§ 1177). Such a State may come into existence either by integration of States or by way of disintegration (§ 1183). Again, in such a State, we have a new distinction between different kinds of members added to the other distinctions which we generally find in States—the distinction between membra immediata and membra mediata (§§ 1122-3). If we regard the membra rerumpublicarum minorum, we find that the Heads of these lesser or contained States are superiores on what we may call a 'downward' view, but subditæ on an 'upward' view, while the other members of such States [i.e. the members other than the Head] are in duplia subiectio, with the lower superior taking precedence in case of conflict; §§ 1224-5. [Gierke adds that he intended to treat the theory of the federal State, as it appears in the literature of positive German public law, in a subsequent section; but this section was never published.]

192. A later section (§ 20) was to have been devoted to this theme, but the section has not been written.

Nettelbladt
on the respublica
composita

LIST OF AUTHORS CITED

A 1500 to 1650

B 1650 to 1800

A. LIST OF AUTHORS CITED. 1500-1650

ALBERGATI, F., a native of Bologna, who published at Bologna, in 1599, a work entitled Il Cardinale, and at Rome, in 1583, a Trattato del modo di ridurre a pace l' inimicizia privata. Gierke refers to his Discorsi politici as an attack upon Bodin which is based on Aristotle (Rome, 1602).

ALSTED, J. H. A., 1588-1638, professor of philosophy at Herborn (in Nassau), and teacher both of philosophy and theology; an encyclopaedic writer on both of these and on a number of other subjects. Gierke refers to his De Statu Rerumpublicarum, Herborn, 1612.

ALTHUSIUS, J., 1557-1638, professor of law at Herborn, 1590, and syndic of the town of Emden, 1601. Gierke first drew the attention of scholars to his writings by the monograph which he devoted to them in 1880. The two of his writings which he repeatedly quotes in this section are Politica methodice digesta, 1st edition, Herborn, 1603, 3rd, 1614 (the 3rd edition has lately been reprinted, with some few omissions, and edited with an introduction, by C J Friedrich, Harvard University Press, 1932), Dicaeologia, Herborn, 1617, a work in two books, totum et universum jus quo utimur complectentes.

ARNIAEUS, H., a student and teacher of medicine, philosophy and politics, who, after first professing ethics at Frankfort on the Oder, and then medicine at Helmstedt, became physician to the King of Denmark, and died at Copenhagen in 1636. In his political doctrines he was an opponent of Althusius. He published two volumes of 'collected political writings' (Leipzig, 1633 later edition, Strassburg, 1648). Gierke refers to five of his political writings: Doctrina politica in genuinam methodum quae est Aristotelis reducta, first published in 1606, and suggesting by its very title an attack on Althusius' Politica methodice digesta of 1603, De jure majestatis libri tres, first published in 1610, De auctoritate principum in populum semper inviolabilis, first published in 1611, De Republica, seu reflectionis politicae libri duo, first published in 1615, De subjectione et executione clericorum, published in 1612. J. Maxwell, sometime bishop of Ross, published Lex, Rex the Law and the Prince, in 1644, 'with a confutation of the ruinous grounds of H. Arnisaeus' (and of William Barclay, q.v.)

ARUMAKUS, D., 1579-1673, a jurist, professor of law at Jena, and said to be founder of the study of public law in Germany. He published in 1617-23 five volumes of Discursus academici de jure publico, written by himself and by other scholars.* Gierke refers to various contributions which appear in this collection.

AYALA, B., born at Antwerp about 1548, a jurisconsult, who held at one time a financial post in the army of Philip II of Spain, and wrote a work De jure et officiis bellicis et disciplina militari, published at Douai, 1582, and re-published at Antwerp in 1597.

BARCLAY, W., 1543-1605, a Scotsman from Aberdeen, who studied law at Bourges under Gajas, and himself became professor of civil law at Angers. In addition to commentaries on Roman law, he wrote: De Regno et regali.

* Such discursus are often disputations held before—or, as we should nowadays say, theses supervised by—the professor who edits the collection.

potestate, adversus Buchananum, Brutum [i.e. the author of the Vind. contra Tyrannos], Boucherum et reliquos Monarchomachos, Paris, 1600 (Gierke cites the Hanover edition of 1612) Locke refers to this work at the end of the Second Treatise Barclay also wrote a work on the Papacy, which was published posthumously, in 1609, under the title of De Potestate papae, an quatenus in principes saeculares jus et imperium habeat, representing the Gallican point of view.

BEKINSAV (Becconsall), W., 1496-1559, fellow of New College, Oxford, and author of De supremo et absoluto Regis imperio, a work dedicated to Henry VIII, and published in 1546 (Gierke cites the reprint in Goldast's Monarchia Sacri Romani Imperii of 1611).

BELLARMINE, R., 1542-1621, cardinal-archbishop of Capua, member of the Jesuit order, and one of the chief writers of the Counter-Reformation. Gierke refers to his De potestate summa pontificis in rebus temporalibus adversus Barciam (first published in 1610, but cited according to the Cologne edition of 1611) This work, as being Ultramontane, and as attacking the more Gallican attitude of Barclay's work on the Papacy, was at once condemned by the Parlement of Paris in the year of its publication. Gierke also refers to other writings of Bellarmine, more particularly his De Laicis, in the Cologne edition of his Opera omnia, 1620.

BENECKENDORF . Author of Repetitio et explicatio de regulis juris, Frankfort on the Oder, 1593.

BERCKRINGER, D., sometime tutor to the children of the Elector Palatine; became professor at Utrecht in 1640, and died in 1667. Gierke refers to his Institutiones politicae sue de Republica, published at Utrecht in 1662. He is also said to have written, in answer to Hobbes, an Examen elementorum philosophorum de bono cive, which was never published.

BESOLD, C. B., 1577-1638, a jurist, who became professor of law at Tubingen in 1610, but crossing over to the Catholic side during the Thirty Years' War (in 1630), he became professor of civil and public law at Ingolstadt, in Bavaria, in 1635. He was a voluminous writer, both on legal and (after his conversion) on ecclesiastical subjects. Gierke refers to his Opus politicum (or, as it was called in an earlier form, which first appeared in 1618, Politiorum libri duo), and cites it according to the Strassburg edition of 1626. It is a collection of 'Discourses', which are sometimes cited separately by Gierke (e.g. Discursus III de Democratia, and the 'Discourses' De statu Republicae mixtae and De jure Universitatum).

BEZA, T., 1519-1605, the great Calvinist teacher in the age succeeding Calvin himself. To him we may ascribe, for reasons given by A. Elkan, Die Publizisten der Bartholomäusnacht, the authorship of the anonymously printed De jure magistratum in subditos et officio subditorum erga magistratus, which professes to have been printed at Magdeburg in 1578. The work deals with the problem of resistance, as it had been raised in the minds of the French Calvinists after the massacre of 1572, and seeks to re-define the Calvinistic attitude to that problem. There is a French version (of 1574), entitled Droit des Magistrats, which was printed before the Latin original.

BIERMANN Author of Dissertatio de jure Principatus

BLONDEL, D., 1591-1655, Huguenot preacher and writer, successor to Vossius in the chair of history at Amsterdam in 1650. De jure plebis in regimine ecclesiastico, Paris, 1648.

BODIN, J., 1530-96, French jurist and man of affairs. Six livres de la République, 1577. In Latin, under the title of De Republica, 1584. Cited by Gierke in the second Latin edition, Frankfort, dated 1591. A full account of Bodin is given in J. W. Allen's Political Thought in the Sixteenth Century.

BOLOGNETUS, 1539-85, ecclesiastical writer on jurisprudence. De lege, iure et aequitate.

BORNITIUS, J., a German jurist of the first half of the seventeenth century. Four works, including one on sovereignty (De maiestate politica, Leipzig, 1610), are cited by Gierke in note 16 to § 14. The dates range from 1607 to 1625.

BORTIUS, M. De natura iurum maiestatis et regalium, printed in Arumacus (q.v.), 1, no. 2 (1616).

BOUCHER, J., 1550?-1644, Catholic teacher at Reims and afterwards at Paris, where he was a champion of the League, afterwards canon of Tournai. He wrote De iusta Henrici III abdicatione e Francorum regno, Paris, 1589. Barclay (q.v.) attacks him as a Catholic monarchomachus, along with the Protestants Buchanan and Languet.

BOXXHORN, M. Z., 1602 (or 1612)-53, professor in the University of Leyden; classical scholar, historian and writer on politics. Gierke cites Institutionum politicorum libri duo, 2nd edition, Leipzig, 1665.

BRUTUS, STEPHANUS JUNIUS, probably the pseudonym of Hubert Languet, 1518-81, see Cambridge Historical Journal, 1931. Vindiciae contra Tyrannos, Edinburgh (really Basle), 1579 (Walker's translation, of the seventeenth century, has been reprinted with an introduction by H. J. Laski).

BUCHANAN, G., 1506-82, classical scholar, historian and tutor of James VI of Scotland. De iure regni apud Scotos, 1579 (cited in the 2nd edition of 1580).

BUSIUS, P., ?-1617, professor of law in the University of Franeker, in the United Provinces. De Republica libri III, Franeker, 1613. The British Museum Catalogue also mentions a Tractatus de vi et potestate legum humanarum in tres partes dissectus, Douai, 1608.

CARNIN, CLAUDIO DE Malleus tripartitus, Antwerp, 1620.

CARPZOV, B. C., 1595-1666, jurist. Commentarius in Legem Regiam Germanorum, sive capitulationem Imperatoriam, 1623. Jurisprudentia ecclesiastica seu consistorialis, 1649. The first of these works, dealing with the conditions to which the Emperor agreed at his election, is a treatise on the public law of Germany at the time; the second deals with Protestant Church law in Germany.

CASMIANUS, O., ?-1607, theologian and philosopher, who taught at Stade (in Hanover). He published a work on Psychologia anthropologica in 1594. Gierke refers to his Doctrinae et vitae politicae methodicum et breve sistema, Frankfort, 1603.

CLAPMARUS, A. C., 1574-1604, publicist. De arcana rerum publicarum libri VI, first published posthumously, 1605.

COLLIBUS, HIPPOLYTUS A., 1561-1612, a jurist, of Italian origin, born in Zurich, who served the Elector Palatine from 1593 onwards. He wrote works on the Nobilita (1588), the Principis (1593), the Palatinus suo Aulicus (1600) and the Consiliarius (1596). The third of these appeared in the Speculum aulicarum aliquae politicarum observationum printed at Strassburg in 1600, along with a reprint of the fourth.

CONNANUS (Connan, F. de), 1508-51, a French jurist. Commentarius juris civilis, Paris, 1538 (cited in the Basle edition of 1557).

CONRING, H., 1606-81, professor at Helmstedt, first of medicine and afterwards also of law; one of the great polymaths of his day, who wrote on theology as well as on medicine, law and politics. Gierke refers to the Dissertationes (e.g. de Republica and de necessariis partibus civitatis) in vol. III of his Opera, as published at Brunswick in 1730.

CONTZEN, A., 1573-1635, Jesuit confessor and controversialist. Politiorum libri X, Mainz, 1621.

CORASUS, J. (Jean de Coras), 1513-72, French teacher of law at Toulouse, a Huguenot, who perished in the massacre of St Bartholomew. Gierke refers to his Commentarii on some titles of the Digest, and his Enarrationes on certain responsa, published at Lyons, 1560.

COTHMANN, E., 1557-1624, jurist and professor of law at Rostock. Gierke refers to his Commentary on Justinian's Institutes and Code, 1614, 1616.

COVARRUVIAS Y LEVVA, DIEGO (Didacus), 1512-77, professor of canon law at Oviedo, and bishop of Ciudad Rodrigo and Segovia, president of the Council of Castile, one of the chief jurists of his time. Gierke refers to his Practicae Quaestiones (in the Opera omnia, printed at Frankfort, 1583).

CRÜGER, J., Collegium Politicum, Giesen, 1609.

CUJACIUS (Cujas), J., 1520-90, professor at Bourges, the greatest jurist of his time. Gierke refers to his Paratula to the Digest and the Code, and his notes on the Institutes.

DANAUS (Daneau), L., 1530-96, French Calvinist minister. Politices Christianae libri VII, 1596 (cited in the Paris edition of 1606).

DOMINIS, M. A. DE, 1566-1624, a Dalmatian, who, after being professor at Padua and Brescia, became Archbishop of Spalatro. He wrote a work De Republica Ecclesiastica, and being anxious to publish it, he took counsel with Sir Henry Wotton at Venice, and proceeded to England, where he received preferment, and published in 1617 the first part of his work. Another part was printed in England in 1620, and a third part in Germany in the same year. The whole work includes ten books and fills three folio volumes.

ERENBERGK, W. DE, Eberhard von Weyhe, a German jurist and statesman, 1553-1633 civiter, who used the Latin pseudonym Waremundus de Erenbergk in some of his writings. His Aulicus politicus (Hanover, 1596), to which Gierke refers in note 6 to § 14, was printed under the pseudonym of Durus de Pascolo. (It is included in the Speculum, etc., mentioned above under Collibus, H. a.) He used the other pseudonym, however, for a treatise de regni subsidio (Frankfort, 1606), which Gierke also quotes.

FELDE, J. A., see Bibliography B.

FELWINGER, see Bibliography B.

FRANTZKE, G., 1594-1659, German jurist and administrator. He wrote Commentaries on the Institutes (Strassburg, 1658), as well as on the Digest (Strassburg, 1644).

FRANTZKEN . . . Gierke cites under this name a disquisition de statu reipublicae mixtae (or mixta), printed in Arumaeus (q. s.), and another de potestate principis. (Should they properly be cited under the name of Frantzke?)

FRIEDENREICH, Z. Politiorum liber, Strassburg, 1609.

GENTILIS, A., 1551-1611, professor of civil law at Oxford, 1587-1611. Gierke refers to his De jure bellii (1588-9), which preceded by many years the work of Grotius.

GNEINZIUS, C., Exercitationes politicae, Wittenberg, 1617-18.

GRASZWINKEL, DIRK, 1600-66, a Dutch jurist, who worked with Grotius and was associated with John de Witt. He wrote on behalf of the Venetian State, as well as against Selden's Mare clausum. Gierke refers to his De jure majestatis, the Hague, 1642.

GREGORIUS, P., 1540²-96², teacher of law first at Toulouse (hence called Tholosanus) and afterwards at Pont-à-Mousson. De Republica libri XXVI, 1586, cited in the Frankfort (? Lyons) edition of 1609.

GREGORIUS DE VALENTIA—see Valentia

GROTIUS, HUGO, 1585-1645. De jure belli et pacis, Paris, 1625, cited in the Amsterdam edition of 1702. De imperio summarum potestatum circa sacra, Paris, 1646, cited in the 4th edition, the Hague, 1661.

GRYPHIANDER De Curi Societate (in Arumaeus, q.v.)

HEIDER, W., 1558-1626, professor of ethics and politics at Jena, and a follower of Aristotle. Systema philosophiae politicae, 1610 (cited in the Jena edition of 1628).

HEMMINO, N., 1513-1600, professor at Copenhagen, a follower of Melanchthon. De lege naturali apodeictica methodus, 1577, cited in the Wittenberg edition of 1652.

HOBES, T., 1588-1679, Elementa philosophiae de Cive, originally published at Paris in 1642 with the title de Cive published under the fuller title in the Amsterdam edition of 1647, which Gierke has used Leviathan, 1651. A Latin version was made by Hobbes for the Amsterdam edition of his works in 1668, and Gierke has used this version.

HOENONTUS, P. H., 1576-1640, teacher of law at Herborn, in the service of various German princes. Disputationum politicarum liber, 3rd edition, Herborn, 1615 (a work of the nature of a system of public law).

HOTOMAN, F., 1524-90, French jurisconsult and Huguenot lived, after the massacre of St Bartholomew, in Geneva and Basle. Francogallia, Geneva, 1573, cited in the Frankfort edition of 1665 (Translated into English in 1711 by Viscount Molesworth, with a famous preface on the nature of Whig principles). Gierke also refers to his Quaestiones illustres.

KECKERMANN, B., 1571-1609, professor at Heidelberg, and a follower of Aristotle. Systema disciplinae politicae, Hanover, 1607.

KIRCHNER, H., published a number of works at Marburg, including one entitled Legatus (the rights, dignity and office of the Ambassador, 1614). Gierke cites his Respublica, Marburg, 1608. Coryat's Crudities includes his oration 'in praise of the travell of Germany in particular'.

KLING, MELCHIOR, 1504-71, jurist and lecturer at Wittenberg. Enarrationes in libros IV Institutionum, 1542.

KNICHEN, A. see Bibliography B.

KNIPSCHILD, P., 1596-1657, publicist and syndic at Esslingen, an imperial Free Town. Tractatus politico-juridicus de iuribus et privilegiis civitatum imperialium, Ulm, 1657.

KONIG . Actes disputationum politicarum, Jena, 1619. Theatrum politicum (n.d.).

LAMPADIUS, J., 1593-1649, jurist and minister in the duchy of Brunswick. De jurisdictione imperii Romano-Germanici 1620 circiter Conring (q.v.), and later Kulps (see Bibliography B), were concerned in the later editions of the work, published under the title of De republica Romano-Germanica.

LAPIDE, HIPPOLYTUS A (the pseudonym of B. Chemnitz), writer and publicist, 1605-78, De ratione status in imperio nostro Romano-Germanico, 1640. (Ratio status here is not raison d'état, but 'general principles of government'.)

LAUTERBACH, W. A., 1618-78, jurist and professor at Tübingen. Dissertationes

academicae, 1694. Compendium juris, 1679. Both of these works appeared posthumously

LESSIUS, L., 1554-1623, Jesuit, professor of philosophy at Douai, and afterwards of theology at Louvain. De justitia et jure, 1606 (cited in the edition published at Antwerp in 1612).

LEIBENTHAL, C., 1586-1647, professor of 'practical philosophy and rhetoric' at Giessen. Collegium politicum, 1619, cited in the Marburg edition of 1644.

LIMNAEUS, J. L., 1592-1665, jurist, chancellor in the duchy of Brunswick. Gierke refers to Jus publicum Imperii Rom.-Germ. 1629-45. He also wrote a commentary on the Wahlkapitulationen (Capitulationes imperatorum), from Charles V onwards, published in 1651 at Strassburg.

LIPSII, J., 1547-1606, professor at Leyden (with Scaliger), and afterwards at Louvain. Politicorum libri VI, Antwerp, 1589 (cited in the edition of 1604) (Lipius advocated a system of one exclusive religion, and his policy for dissidents was ut et seca).

LUGO, J. DE, 1583-1660, Spanish Jesuit, professor of theology in Rome, made cardinal in 1643. (Quimine, first distributed in his palace by the Jesuits, who had received it from South America, was called poudre de Lugo) De justitia et iure, cited in the Lyons edition of 1670.

MACHIAVELLI, N., 1469-1527. Il Principe, published posthumously, 1532.

MARCA, P. DE, 1594-1662, French canonist and bishop. De concordia sacerdotis et imperii, seu de libertatibus ecclesiae Gallicanae, 1641 first part, 1663 as a whole.

MARIANA, J., 1537-1624, Spanish Jesuit, who from 1574 to his death lived and wrote at the house of his order in Toledo. De rege et regis institutione, Toledo, 1599, cited in the Frankfort edition of 1611.

MATTHIAS, C. (member of a Brandenburg family?) Collegium politicum, Giessen, 1611. Systema politicum, Giessen, 1618.

MEISSNER, B., 1587-1626, professor of theology at Wittenberg. De legibus, Wittenberg, 1616.

MENOCHTUS, J. S., 1576-1655, teacher in the Jesuit College at Milan. Hiéro-politica, cited in the 2nd edition, Cologne, 1626.

MILTON, JOHN, 1608-74. The tenure of kings and magistrates, 1648-9. Eikonoclastes (an answer to Eikon Basilike), 1649. Defensio pro populo Anglicano (an answer to the Defensio regia of Salmasius, q.v.), 1650-1. Gierke cites these in the 1848 edition (London) of Milton's Prose Works.

MOLINA, L., 1535-1601, a Spanish Jesuit, who taught for many years at the Portuguese University of Evora. De justitia et iure, cited in the Mainz edition of 1614.

MOLINAUS (Dumoulin), C., 1500-66, a famous French teacher of law and legal writer, who was for some time a refugee in Germany, at Tubingen. Commentarii ad Codicem (Tubingen lectures), printed 1604.

OBRECHT, G., 1547-1612, professor of law at Strassburg. De justitia et iure, no. 1 in Selectissimae disputationes, Strassburg, 1599. Secreta politica, 1617, cited in the Strassburg edition of 1644.

OLDENDORP, J., 1480-1561, a jurist who was for some time syndic at Lübeck and then professor at Cologne, afterwards settled at Marburg. Juris naturalis, gentium et civilis usagae, Cologne, 1539. Gierke also mentions a work in German, 'Counsels how one may maintain good policy and order in towns and territories', Rostock, 1579. Oldendorp was syndic at Rostock before he went to Lübeck, and thus treatise on practical politics, published at Rostock, may have been written originally before he left Rostock in 1534.

OLIZAROVIVS, A A De Politica hominum societate, Danzig, 1651. The name suggests a Polish origin (Olizarowski)

OMPHALUS (Omphalus), J , 1500-67, German jurist De civili politia libri III, Cologne, 1565

OSSE, M. VON, 1506²-57, jurist and administrator in the Saxon electorate. Testamentum (treating of the duties of a sovereign), addressed to the Saxon Elector. Parts were printed in 1607 and 1622, but the first complete edition was that of Thomasius, 1717. The 'testament' was a regular genre in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries

OTTO, D , 1600²-60⁷, German jurist. Dissertatio (in Arumaeus, q v) an mixtus detur reipublicae status Tractatus politicus de maiestate imperii et imperantis (Strassburg, 1623²) De jure publico Romani imperii, Jena, 1616 (the first compendium of German public law)

PAURMEISTER (Baurmeister), T VON, 1555-1616, jurist and administrator, and a critic of Bodin. Commentarius rerum politicarum et iuridicarum De iurisdictione imp Rom libri II, 1616

REINKING, D , 1590-1664, jurist and administrator Tractatus de regimine saeculari et ecclesiastico, Giessen, 1619

ROSSAEUS (Rose, Guillaume), 1542²-1602, preacher and almoner to Henri III, bishop of Senlis, a violent partisan of the League and opponent of Henri IV. Liber de justia reipublicae christianaæ in reges impios et haereticos auctoritate, Paris, 1590. Rossaeus, like Boueher (q v), is a Catholic monarchomachus

SALAMONIUS, J MARIUS De Principatu libri VII, Rome, 1544, cited in the Paris edition of 1578. This is a work which, in the profundity of its thought, deserves to be counted among the classics of the sixteenth century. Gürke also cites his Commentary on the Digest, Basle, 1530

SALMASIUS (Claude de Saumaise), 1588-1653, French classical scholar, at one time professor at Leyden, invited by Prince Charles to write a defence of his father Charles I. Defensio regia pro Carolo I, November, 1649, cited in the Paris edition of 1651. Milton, on the instruction of the Council of State, replied in his Defensio pro populo Anglicano.

SCHONBORNER, G , 1579-1637, German jurist, and administrator in Silesia. Politicorum libri VII, 1614, cited in the 4th edition, printed at Frankfort, 1628

SELDEN, JOHN, 1584-1654. De jure naturali et gentium, juxta disciplinam Ebraeorum, London, 1640. Mare Clausum, London, 1635

SOTO, D , 1494-1560, Dominican, teacher at the University of Salamanca. De justitia et iure, 1556 (cited in the Venice edition of 1602)

STRYK, S , see Bibliography B

SUAREZ, F , 1548-1617, Jesuit, professor of philosophy in Spain, one of the greatest thinkers of his order. Tractatus de legibus ac Deo legislatore, 1611 (cited in the Antwerp edition of 1613)

TULDEN, T VON, obit 1645, professor at Bois le Due. De Reginime civili, cited in the Louvain edition of his works, 1702

VALENTIA, GREGORIUS DF, 1551-1603, Spanish Jesuit, professor of theology at Ingolstadt. Commentarius theologicus, Ingolstadt, 1592

VARQUEZ, F , 1509-66, ecclesiastical writer on natural law. Controversiarum illustrum aliarumque frequentium libri III, Frankfort, 1572

VICTORIA, F , obit 1546, Dominican. Relectiones tredecim, Ingolstadt, 1580. An earlier edition, Relectiones undecim (de Potestate Ecclesiae, etc) had appeared in 1563.

VOETIUS, G., 1593-1680, Dutch minister, and afterwards professor at Utrecht. Politica ecclesiastica, Amsterdam, 1669-76, vols. I-IV.

VULTEJUS, H., 1565-1634, jurist and classical scholar, professor of jurisprudence at Marburg. Jurisprudentiae Romanas a Justiniiano compositas libri II, Marburg, 1590. Gierke also refers to his Commentaries on the Institutes.

WERDENHAGEN, J. A., 1581-1652, a German scholar, theologian and professor, from Helmstedt, who lived at Leyden about 1627-35, and wrote there some of his main works, occupied afterwards in affairs at Bremen and Magdeburg, and in the duchy of Brunswick. Politica generalis, seu introductio universalis in omnes Respublicas, Amsterdam, 1632.

WINKLER, B., 1579-1648, taught at Leipzig and Basle; afterwards syndic at Lubeck, one of the early writers on natural law. Principiorum juris libri V, Leipzig, 1615.

WINTONENSIS, STEPHANUS (Stephen Gardiner), 1483²-1555, Master of Trinity Hall, Cambridge, 1525-49, and again in 1553, bishop of Winchester, 1531, doctor of civil and of canon law. Oratio de vera obediencia, London, 1535 (cited by Gierke from Goldast's Monarchia of 1611, I, pp. 716-33).

WURMSEER . Exercitationes

ZEPPER, W. Z., 1550-1607, the first systematic writer on the problems of the constitution of the Protestant churches, professor at Herborn, at the same time as Althusius. De politia ecclesiastica, Herborn, 1595.

ZWINGLI, U. Z., 1484-1531. Gierke refers to his Works, as edited by Schuler and Schulthess. See A. Farner's monograph on Die Lehre von Kirche und Staat bei Zwingli, 1930.

B. LIST OF AUTHORS CITED 1650-1800

ACHENWALL, G A (1719-72) [professor of law in the University of Göttingen, and a student of contemporary comparative politics, who travelled in England and Holland, and was honoured by George III. He published, in 1749, an outline of contemporary politics in the greater European monarchies and republics. Gierke refers to one of his legal works], Jus Naturae, as printed in 1781, when the 7th edition appeared. This contains (a) Prolegomena, 5th edition (first printed in 1758), (b) Pars prior, 7th edition (first printed in 1750), and (c) Pars posterior, 8th edition (first printed in 1750).

ALBERTI, V. (1635-97) [Lutheran theologian, and professor at Leipzig], Compendium iuris naturae orthodoxae theologiae conformatum, Leipzig, 1678 [The work has been described as 'an attempt to interpret natural law as the order prevailing in the original sinless condition of man'].

ANDLER, F F VON (1617-1703) [lecturer in law at Wurzburg], Jurisprudentia qua publica, qua privata, etc., 1670.

BECCARIA, C B (1738-94) [an Italian publicist, of noble family, who became a professor of law and economics in Milan], Dei delitti e delle pene, Monaco, 1764.

BECKER, O H [sometyme Regierungsrath in the principality of Waldeck], Jus mundi seu vindiciae juris naturae, cited in the 2nd edition, 1698 (first printed in 1690).

BECKMANN, J C (1641-1717) [professor at Frankfort on the Oder, who wrote a Historia orbis terrarum geographica et civilis, and also historical works about the principality of Anhalt. The works to which Gierke refers are his] Meditationes politicae, Frankfort, 1679, and his Conspectus doctrinae politicae, Frankfort, 1691.

BLACKSTONE, Sir W (1723-80), Commentaries on the Laws of England, 1765-69.

BOECLER, J. H B (1611-72) [professor of history at Straasburg, an elegant Latinist, and a classical scholar as well as an historian and writer on politics. The work to which Gierke refers is his] Institutiones politicae, Straasburg, 1674.

BOEHMER, J. H., 1674-1749 [professor in the University of Halle, and one of the foremost scholars and jurists of his day, especially in civil and ecclesiastical law. His works on Jus ecclesiasticum protestantinum and on Jus parochiale exercised a great influence. Gierke cites his] Introductio in jus publicum universale, in the Prague edition of 1743 (first printed in 1709) [The newly founded University of Halle had a flourishing school of law in the first half of the eighteenth century. see Gundling, Heineccius, Nettelbladt, Thomasius and Wolff infra].

BOSSUET, J. B., 1627-1704 [bishop of Meaux] Politique tirée des propres paroles de l'écriture Sainte, Paris, 1709 (cited from his Oeuvres complètes, Tome xvii, Paris, 1826).

CELLARIUS, B [1614-89, preacher and professor of theology at Helmstedt. Besides a theological work, on the controversies between the churches of the Augsburg Confession and the Roman, he wrote Tabulae ethicae politicae et physicae. The work to which Gierke refers is] Politica succincta, Jena, 1658 (cited in the 11th edition, of 1711).

CLASEN, D., Politicæ compendium succinctum, Helmstedt, 1675 [Clasen also wrote a work De religione politica, Magdeburg, 1655. He also wrote on the 'theology' and 'oracles' of the 'Gentiles'—i.e. of the ancient world]

COCCÆJI, H. DE, 1644-1719 [a jurist who succeeded to Pufendorf's chair at Heidelberg, but left Heidelberg in 1688, and became professor at Frankfort on the Oder in 1690. He exercised an influence on the study both of natural law and of public law. Gierke refers to his] Prodromus juris gentium, Frankfort, 1719, and Hypomnemata juris ad seriem Institutionum Justin, Frankfort, 1698.

COCCÆJI, S. DE, 1679-1755 [third son of H. de Coccæji, at first, like his father, a professor at Frankfort on the Oder, but afterwards busily occupied in judicial activities and reforms in Prussia under Frederick William I and Frederick II. Gierke refers to three of his writings] Disputatio de principio iuris naturalis unico, vero et adaequato, Frankfort, 1699 [a 'disputation' for the doctorate, in which he expounded his father's ideas on natural law, as based on the will of God. As his father had never published his views, except in lectures, this Disputatio first gave them prominence], Tractatus juris gentium, Frankfort, 1702, Novum systema iustitiae naturalis et Romanae, 1740. [The 1740 edition is actually called Elementa iustitiae, etc. the title Novum systema is first used in a later reprint of 1744]

CUMBERLAND, R., 1632-1709 [really 1631-1718] Cumberland was a member of Pepys' college, Magdalene, and a friend of Pepys. He became bishop of Peterborough in 1691. He published in 1672 his De legibus naturae disquisitio philosophica, dedicated to another of his Magdalene friends, one of the great lawyers of the reign of Charles II, Sir Orlando Bridgeman. The work is an answer to Hobbes, on utilitarian lines. Gierke cites it as] De legibus naturae, 2nd edition, printed at Lubeck and Frankfort, 1683 [The book was translated from the Latin by Barbeyrac (for whom see under Pufendorf, infra), with notes, 1774]

DARIES, J. G., 1714-91 [He became professor of moral and political philosophy at Jena in 1744. From Jena he moved to Frankfort on the Oder in 1763, where he held the chair of law till his death. He was a voluminous writer, who published works on metaphysics and ethics as well as on law and politics. Gierke refers to his] Institutiones jurisprudentiae universalis, cited in the 7th edition, Jena, 1776 (first published in 1746)

EHRENBACH, J. N. MYLER AB, 1610-77 [a man of affairs, as well as a student of politics, who played a considerable part in his time. He was deeply versed in the public law of the Empire. In 1656 he had published an Outline of the main rights of the Princes and States of the Empire, which attained great vogue. Later, he planned a larger work, in a number of parts, under the title of Opus de jure publico imperii Romano-Germanici. The work to which Gierke refers is the 7th part of this opus, dealing with officials, magistrates and their assistants, under the title of] Hyparchologia, Stuttgart, 1678

FELDE, JOHANNES A. [a critic of Grotius, and also the writer of a tractatus de peste], Elementa juris universi et in specie juris publici Justitiae, Frankfort and Leipzig, 1664.

FELWINGER, J. P. [? professor at Altdorf c. 1650-75 acted as praeses at disputations on politics, in the fashion of the day], Dissertationes politicae, Altdorf, 1666

FÉNELON, F. DE SALIGNAC DE LAMOTTE, 1651-1715 [tutor to the Dauphin under Louis XIV, and afterwards archbishop of Cambrai. Gierke refers to an] Essai sur le gouvernement civil, selon les principes de Fénelon, 3rd edition, by

A. M. Ramsay, London, 1723 [Fénelon's own writings are the Télémaque o 1699, and the Dialogues des morts, composés pour l'éducation d'un prince, first published in 1712, and republished in an enlarged edition by Ramsay in 1718]

FERGUSON, ADAM, 1723-1816 [professor, first of natural philosophy, and afterwards of moral philosophy, at Edinburgh]. Essay on Civil Society, 1766, Principles of Moral and Political Science, ['being chiefly a retrospect of lectures delivered in the College of Edinburgh'], 1792

FICHTE, J. G., 1762-1814 [professor of philosophy at Jena, 1794-1799, dismissed for his views, after its foundation in 1810, Rector in 1811-12 of the University of Berlin] Gierke refers to

I. Fichte's Collected Works, in the Berlin edition of 1845-6, and therein to the following works

- (a) Contributions to the justification of the opinion of the Public on the French Revolution, 1793 (Works, vi, pp. 103 sqq.);
- (b) Foundations of Natural Law according to the principles of Scientific Theory, published in 1796-7, at Jena and Leipzig (Works, iii, pp. 1 sqq.);
- (c) A System of Ethical Theory according to the Principles of Scientific Theory, 1798 (Works, iv, pp. 1 sqq.);
- (d) The Self-contained Commercial State [Der geschlossene Handelstaat], published in 1800 at Tübingen (Works, iii, pp. 387 sqq.);
- (e) The Foundations of the Present Age, lectures delivered in 1804-5, published at Berlin in 1808 (Works, vii, pp. 257 sqq.);
- (f) The Theory of the State, or the Relation of the Primitive State to the Law of Reason, lectures delivered in 1813, first published at Berlin in 1820 (Works, vii, pp. 367 sqq.)

II. Posthumous Works, published in Berlin, 1834, especially the work entitled A System of Jurisprudence, lectures delivered in 1812 (in ii, pp. 493 sqq.).

FILANGIERI, G., 1762-86 [an Italian publicist, of noble Neapolitan family, who continued the work of the school of legal and political philosophy at Naples inspired by Vico] La scienza della legislazione, Naples, 1780

FILMER, Sir R. [c. 1588-1653], a Kentish Royalist who published in 1648 The Anarchy of a Limited or Mixed Monarchy, attacking the theory of Philip Hunton's Treatise of Monarchy of 1643, along with the writings of Grotius, Hobbes and Milton. It is curious, in this connection, to notice (1) that Locke seems to owe some of his theory to Hunton, and (2) that Locke, very naturally, seeks to prepare the way for his own theory, in the Second Treatise, by attacking Filmer in the First. Gierke refers to the work by which Filmer is best known], Patriarcha, published posthumously in 1680

FREDERICK II [King of Prussia], 1712-86 [Gierke refers to three of his writings]

- (a) Considérations sur l'état présent du corps politique de l'Europe, 1738 (Oeuvres viii, pp. 1 sqq.);
- (b) Antimachiavelli, 1739, edited by Voltaire 1740 (Ibid. viii, pp. 59 sqq.);
- (c) Essai sur les formes du gouvernement et sur les devoirs des Souverains, 1777 (Ibid. ix, pp. 195 sqq.)

GUNDLING, N. H., 1671-1729 [the son of a clergyman, trained for the Church, who turned to law under the influence of Thomasius, and became ultimately professor of natural and international law at Halle. He wrote a great number of dissertations and compendia—partly, it is said, to escape from the distractions of an unhappy marriage. Gierke refers to]

- (a) Jus naturae et gentium, as printed in the 2nd edition (Halle and Magdeburg, 1728; the 1st edition had appeared in 1714),
- (b) A Discursus on natural and international law [published posthumously, as many of his Discursus were], Frankfort, 1734,
- (c) Exercitationes academicae, more especially.
 - (1) Exerc. iv, pp. 155 sqq. (entitled Status naturalis Hobbesi in corpore iuris ciuilis defensu et defendendu, and belonging to the year 1706),
 - (2) Exerc. xvi, pp. 829 sqq. (De universitate delinquentis eisque poenis, 1724).

HEINCKE, F. J., Systema juris publici universalis, 1765. [This is the only information which Gierke gives. The Allgemeine Deutsche Biographie gives an account of F. J. Heinke (1726-1803), a Silesian who studied at Prague, where he became director and President of the Law Faculty—eventually entering the service of the government in Vienna in 1767. But the Biographie does not mention any Systema juris as having been published by him.]

HEINRICIUS, J. G., 1681-1741 [professor of law at Halle, and elsewhere, and one of the greatest of the German jurists of the eighteenth century. Gierke refers to three of his works].

- (1) Elementa juris naturae et gentium, first published in 1737 (printed in vol. 3 of Opera omnia, Geneva, 1741 onwards),
- (2) Praelectiones academicae in Hugo Grotius de jure bellorum et pacis libri, published in 1744 (Opera omnia, viii, 1),
- (3) Praelectiones academicae in S. Pufendorfii de officio hominis et ciuii libri, 2nd edition, 1748

HERDER, J. G., 1744-1803 [German critic, man of letters, and collector of Volkslieder. Gierke refers to his] Ideen zur Geschichte der Menschheit, 1784-5 (in his Collected Works in Philosophy and History, vols. iv-vii).

HERTIUS, J. N., 1652-1710 [one of the leading jurists of Germany in the seventeenth century, and professor of law at Giessen. Gierke refers to]

- (a) Elementa prudentias ciuilis, 1689 (cited in the 2nd edition, Frankfort on the Main, 1702),
- (b) Commentationum aitque opusculorum vol. II, as published in 1737, at Frankfort on the Main (the items had been first published in 1700 and 1716)

HOFFRAUER, J. C. [1766-1827, professor of philosophy at Halle], Naturrecht aus dem Begriffe des Rechts entwickelt, 1793 (cited in the 3rd edition, Halle, 1803).

HORNIUS, J. F., 1620-70? [not mentioned in the German or Dutch National Biographies. Gierke refers to two works] De subiecto juris naturalis, Utrecht, 1663, Politiorum pars architectonica, Utrecht, 1664 [reprinted as Architectonica de Civitate, with notes by S. Kuchenbecher, Leyden, 1699].

HUBER, U., 1636-94 [a Dutch jurist of eminence, professor at Franeker in Friesland]

- (1) De jure ciuitatis, 1674 (cited in the Franeker edition of 1713),
- (2) Praelectionum juris ciuilis tom. III, 1666 (cited in the Leipzig edition of 1735),
- (3) Institutiones juris publici, in Opera minora, i, 1 (the Utrecht edition of 1746)

HUMBOLDT, W. VON, 1767-1835 [thinker and statesman, Prussian minister of education, 1809-10].

- (1) Ideas for an essay on the limits of the activity of the State, 1792 Parts printed in Thalia [Schüller's Leipzig magazine], 1792, and in the Berlin Monthly, 1792, published complete, Breslau, 1851.

HUME, D., 1711-76 [Essays Moral and Political, 1741-2 Gierke refers to the edition of the] Political Essays, translated into German by C. J. Kraus, Königsberg, 1813

ICKSTATT, S. A., 1702-76 [a jurist in the Bavarian service, for some time professor, at Ingolstadt, of public and international law and the law of nature, under the style of jus oeconomico-camerale], Opuscula juridica veru arguments, vol. I, Ingolstadt and Augsburg, 1747, vol. II, Munich and Ingolstadt, 1759

JENA, G. VON, 1620-1703 [a jurist in the service of the Great Elector and his successor, for some time professor at Frankfort on the Oder], Collegium juris publici, Frankfort on the Main, 1658 (it also appeared as Fragmenta de ratione status, 1657) [A series of dissertations]

JUSTI, J. H. G. VON, 1720-71 [professor at Vienna of 'applied politics', afterwards in the Prussian service]

- (1) The Foundations of a good government, in five books, Frankfort and Leipzig, 1759,
- (2) The Nature and Being of States, Berlin, Stettin and Leipzig, 1760

[The work on applied politics for which Justi was best known was entitled, The Bases of the power and prosperity of States, or a detailed account of the whole science of policy (Polizeiwissenschaft), of which vol. I appeared in 1760, and vol. II in 1761. But this was only one of a considerable number of political writings—among them the two which Gierke cites. Justi had a varied and wandering career, which led him incidentally into the management of mines, but he found time to write a great number of books, and his friends called him the Buffon of Germany]

KANT, I., 1724-1804 [professor of logic at Königsberg] Collected Works, in chronological order, edited by G. Hartenstein, Leipzig, and especially

- (1) On the saying, 'That may be right in theory, but it has no value in practice', 1793 (Works, VI, pp. 303 sqq.),
- (2) Perpetual Peace, 1795 (Ibid. VI, pp. 405 sqq.),
- (3) Metaphysic of Morality (Ibid. VII, pp. 1 sqq.), containing the 'Metaphysical Elements of Jurisprudence', and the 'Metaphysical Elements of Ethics', which appeared separately in 1797 and were put together in one volume in 1798

[In English, see T. K. Abbott, Kant's Critique of Practical Reason, and other works on the theory of Ethics]

KESTNER, H. E., 1671-1723 [professor of law at Rinteln, near Minden]

- (1) Jus naturae et gentium, ex ipsis fontibus ad ductum Grotii Pufendorfi et Cocceii derivatum, Rinteln, 1705,
- (2) Compendium juris universi, Rinteln, 1707

KLEIN, E. F., 1744-1816 [a jurist who took a considerable part in the development of Prussian law towards 1800, and also lectured at the University of Halle, 1791-1801], Short Essay, Halle, 1797 (the Essay 'On the nature of civil Society' is in II, pp. 55 sqq.)

KNICHEN, R. G. [died in 1682, was the son of A. Knuchlin, who had been a professor of law, and had defended the cause of the territorial princes against the towns. He wrote] Opus politicum, Frankfort on the Main, 1682.

KREITTMAYR, W. X. A. VON, 1705-90 [Bavarian State-Chancellor, and codifier of the law of Bavaria], Outline of general and of German public law, Munich, 1770

KULPIUS, J. G., 1652-98 [professor of public institutions and public law at Strassburg, 1683-6, afterwards in government service in Würtemberg], Dissertationes academicae, Strassburg, 1705

LEIBNIZ, G. W., 1646-1716.

A Opera omnia, ed. Dutens, Geneva, 1763—the various essays on law and politics, in iv, 3, pp. 159 sqq., including:

- (1) Nova methodus discendariae docendaeque jurisprudentiae, 1667;
- (2) Observationes de principio iuri, 1670;
- (3) Monita quaedam ad S. Pufendorfi principia,
- (4) De suo codice gentium diplomatico monita;
- (5) Caesarini-Fursteneri tractatus de jure suprematus ac legationum Principum Germaniae, 2nd edition, 1678,
- (6) Specimen demonstrationum politicarum pro eligendo Rete Polonorum

B German Writings, edited by Guhrauer, 1838-40—the 'Fragment on the Law of Nature' in i, pp. 414 sqq.

LOCKE, JOHN, 1632-1704.

- (1) Two treatises on Government, London, 1690,
- (2) Letter on Toleration [first published in Latin in 1689, and then in an English Translation in the same year, other letters added, 1690, 1692 and 1705] Cited from the Works, as published in London, 1801, vol. v, pp. 207 sqq. and vol. vi.

DE LOUME, J. L., 1740-1806 [a Swiss political writer, mainly on English politics], La Constitution d'Angleterre, 1771, translated into English, 1775.

LUDWIG, J. P. VON, 1668-1743 [professor of philosophy, and afterwards of history and public law, at Halle], Opuscula minora, Halle, 1720.

MABLY, ABBÉ DE, 1709-85 [French publicist]

- (1) Doutes proposés aux philosophes économistes sur l'ordre naturel et essentiel des sociétés politiques, The Hague [a work directed against Mercier de la Rivière, q.v.],
- (2) De la législation, ou des principes de loi, Amsterdam, 1776.

MEVIUS, D., 1609-70 [jurist; professor at Greifswald, where his father and grandfather had both been professors before him; sometime syndic of Stralsund, and also in the service of Sweden and Mecklenburg], Prodromus jurisprudentiae gentium communis, Stralsund, 1671

MICRAELIUS, J., 1597-1658 [professor at Stettin, historian of Pomerania], Regia Politica Scientia, Stettin, 1654. [In 1647 there had already been published, at Stettin, J. Micraelii aphorismi de regia politica scientia]

MONTEQUEU, C. DE SECONDAT, Baron de la Brède et de Montesquieu, 1689-1755 [president of the court at Bordeaux], Esprit des lois, 1748 (cited in the Amsterdam edition of 1749)

MOSER, F. K. VON, 1723-98 [publicist and statesman, engaged in government service in South Germany, and for some time also in Austria] Master and Servant [i.e. the sovereign and his minister], described with patriotic freedom, Frankfort, 1759 (written in 1758), On the German national spirit, 1765, On Governments, Governing and Ministers material [literally 'rubbish'] for improving the way of the coming century, Frankfort, 1784.

MOSER, JUSTUS, 1720-94 [lawyer and statesman in the bishopric of Osnabrück, where he was advocatus patriae and secretary to the order of Knights, a popular author, compared by Goethe to Benjamin Franklin] History of Osnabrück, Osnabrück, 1768, Patriotic Phantasies, edited by his daughter, Berlin, 1778-86, Miscellaneous Writings, edited by Nicolai, Berlin, 1797-8.

MUELDERER, J C, the elder. Positiones Inaugurales, 2nd edition, Halle-Magdeburg, 1698 (first printed in 1692)

MULLERUS, J. J [? Professor Utriusque Juris at Copenhagen], Institutiones Politicae, Jena, 1692.

NATIONAL ASSEMBLY—Proceedings of the French NA in regard to the confiscation of ecclesiastical property, October 10 to November 2, 1789, Gazette Nationale ou le Moniteur universel (par l'an IV de la République, pp. 291 sqq.) Cf Hübner, Der Eigentum des Kirchenguts, pp. 46 sqq., 56 sqq. Paul Janet, Revue des deux Mondes, Tome 23 (1877), pp. 334–49. [Gierke's reference to the Gazette Nationale is puzzling. When he adds the reference to l'an IV, is he thinking of an edition, such as appeared at Milan, 1802–5, which contained in 74 vols. the Gazette from May 5, 1789, to the 28th of Nivôse, year IV?]

NETTELBLADT, D., 1719–91 [professor of law at Halle, and one of the greatest teachers of law in later eighteenth-century Germany] Systema elementare universae jurisprudentiae naturalis, cited in the 5th edition, Halle, 1785 (first printed in 1748 the present arrangement was first adopted in the 3rd edition of 1776), Systema elementare jurisprudentiae positivae Germanorum generalis, Halle, 1781. [Nettelbladt was a pupil of Wolff at Marburg, and followed him to Halle]

PEREZIUS, A., 1583–1672 [a Spanish jurist, settled in the Netherlands, who was professor at Louvain from 1614 onwards], Jus publicum, quo arcana et jura Principis exponuntur, Amsterdam, 1657.

PLACCUS, V P., 1642–99 [a German scholar from Hamburg, who studied in German universities and Italy, and afterwards practised and taught law in his native city. He was a man of means, who corresponded with various scholars of his day, and wrote on a variety of subjects], Accessiones juris naturalis, privati et publici, Hamburg, 1695

PRASCHUS, J L., 1637–90 [a citizen of Ratisbon, where he held high office and was deep in all civic affairs. Philologist, writer of verse, and dramatist, as well as a writer on laws and politics], Designatio juris naturalis ex disciplina Christianorum, Ratisbon, 1688

PUFENDORF, S., 1632–94 [publicist, jurist, and historian taught at the university of Heidelberg, 1661–8 professor in Lund, on the invitation of Charles XI of Sweden, 1670 onwards historiographer at Stockholm in 1677, and at Berlin in 1688 one of the greatest scholars of his century, and one of the greatest figures in the history of natural law]

(1) Elementorum jurisprudentiae universalis libri II, 1660 (cited in the Frankfort and Jena edition of 1680),

(2) Severinus de Monzambano [pseudonym* adopted by Pufendorf to cover his exposition and critique of the political position of Germany], De statu Imperii Germanici, Geneva [really the Hague], 1667 (cited in the edition published at 'Utopia', 1668) There is a new and critical edition by F. Salomon, Weimar, 1910, in Quellen und Studien zur Verfassungsgeschichte des Deutschen Reichs, III, 4,

(3) De jure naturae et gentium libri VIII, 1672 (cited in the Frankfort and Leipzig edition of 1744, with notes by Hert and Barbeyrac),

(4) De officio hominis et eius secundum legem naturalem libri II, Leyden, 1673 (cited in the Leyden edition of 1769, with 'observations' by Titius, Carmichael, Treuer and Barbeyrac),

(5) Dissertationes academicae selectiores, Upsala, 1677

* Cf. Caesarius-Furstenerius above, under Leibniz

[Barbeyrac (1674-1729), a Huguenot who taught in Berlin, Lausanne and Groningen, translated into French, and annotated, not only (3) and (4) above, but also Grotius De jure bello et pacis]

[Pufendorf's De habitu religiosis Christianae ad vitam civilem liber singularis, 1687, may also be mentioned, as dealing with the relations of Church and State and the problem of toleration at a time when the Revocation of the Edict of Nantes had disturbed men's minds. It is almost contemporary with Locke's Letter on Toleration, which deals with the same problems in the same atmosphere.]

RACHELIUS, S., 1628-91 [jurist and politician: professor of natural and international law at Kiel after 1665], Institutionum jurisprudentiae libri IV, Kiel and Frankfort, 1681.

DE LA RIVIÈRE, P. F. J. H. LE MERCIER, 1720-94 [a disciple of Quesnay, and one of the Physiocrats], L'ordre naturel et essentiel des sociétés politiques, Paris, 1767.

ROUSSEAU, J. J., 1712-78.

(1) Discours sur l'origine et les fondements de l'inégalité parmi les hommes, Paris, 1753,

(2) Du contrat social, ou principes du droit politique, Amsterdam, 1762,

(3) Lettres écrites de la Montagne, Amsterdam, 1764.

[Cf C. E. Vaughan, The Political Writings of Rousseau, Cambridge, 1915]

SCHEIDEMANTEL, H. G. [1739-88, professor of law at Jena and Stuttgart], Public Law, treated according to reason and the customs of the leading nations, Jena, 1770-73

SCHLÖZER, A. L. VON, 1735-1809 [travelled in Sweden and Russia, professor at Göttingen, publicist, historian and educationalist, who, inter alia, continued the work of Achenwall on contemporary politics and institutions in his Theorie der Statistik of 1804. Gierke refers to his] General Public Law and the Theory of Constitutions, Göttingen, 1793

SCHLOZER, C. VON [1774-1831, eldest son of the foregoing, professor of the political sciences at Moscow, circa 1790-1827, lecturer at Bonn, 1828-31], Kleine Schriften, Göttingen, 1807, especially

(1) De jure suffragii in societate aequali, Göttingen, 1795, pp. 11 sqq;

(2) Principia lineas scientiarum politicarum, pp. 81 sqq [Moscow, 1802.]

[His chief importance perhaps lies in the field of political economy. He published at Riga in 1805 and 1807 two volumes on The Principles of Political Economy or the Theory of National Wealth]

SCHMIER, F., 1680-1728 [canonist professor and rector of the University of Salzburg prior of Feldkirch] Jurisprudentia publica universalis, Salzburg, 1722, Jurisprudentia publica imperii Romano-Germanici, Salzburg, 1731

SCHOENAU, F. A. Pelzhoeffler de, Baron, Arcanorum status libri X, Frankfort, 1710

SECKENDORF, V. L. VON, 1626-92 [historian and ducal librarian in the duchy of Gotha; afterwards chancellor in one of the Saxon duchies, a disciple of Boecler (q.v.) at Strassburg] The German Principality, 1656 (cited in the 5th edition, 1678), The Christian State, 1685, German Addresses, 1686.

SIDNEY, ALGERNON, 1622-82, Discourses concerning government [an answer to Filmer's Patriarcha, written shortly after its publication in 1680, first printed in 1698], cited in the Edinburgh edition of 1750.

SIEYÈS, E., Abbé, 1748-1836. [His writings, including his Qu'est-ce que le Tiers État and his Observations sommaires sur les biens ecclésiastiques of 1789, are cited by Gierke in a German translation.] Political Writings, a complete collection by the German translator, 2 volumes, 1796.

SPINOZA, B., 1632-77. Tractatus Theologico-politicus, cited in the Hamburg edition of 1670; Tractatus Politicus, in the Opera Postuma of 1677, pp. 267 sqq., Ethica, ibid., pp. 1 sqq. [The best modern edition is that of van Vloten and Land, 1895.]

[STRYKE, S., 1640-1710, professor at Frankfort on the Oder and afterwards, from 1692 to his death, at Halle, where he was also dean of the Faculty of Law and Rector of the University. His chief work was his Usus modernus Pandectarum. Gierke refers passim to his Dissertationes.]

THOMASIUS, C., 1655-1728 [professor at Leipzig and afterwards at Halle a philosopher and a man of general culture as well as a famous jurist, who advocated the use of German instead of Latin, and attacked Aristotle and scholasticism. His name is connected with the beginnings of the University of Halle, and with its legal fame].

- (1) Institutiones jurisprudentiae divinae, written in 1687 (cited in the Frankfort and Leipzig edition of 1709),
- (2) Fundamenta juris naturae et gentium ex sensu communi deducta, Halle and Leipzig, 1705,
- (3) Dissertationes, 4 volumes, Halle, 1723.

TRITUS, G. G., 1661-1714 [lectured at Leipzig on law from 1688, but did not become Professor until 1710, a pupil of Thomasius].

- (1) Specimen juris publici Romano-Germanici, 1698 (cited in the 2nd edition, Leipzig, 1705);
- (2) Dissertationes juridicae, Leipzig, 1729.

TURGOOT, A. R. J., baron de l'Aulne, 1727-81. Article on Fondation in the Encyclopédie, vol. vii, 1757, Lettres sur la tolérance [? 1753], in Oeuvres, Paris, 1844, II, pp. 675 sqq.

VICO, J. B., 1668-1744 [philosopher, historian and jurist, professor at Naples, where he inspired a school of legal and political philosophy. Gierke refers to] De universi iuri uno principio et fine uno, Naples, 1720, Principi di una scienza nuova intorno alla communa natura delle nazioni, Naples, 1725 (cited in the Milan edition of his Opere, 1836, vols. III-IV).

WACHLER, J. G., Origines juris naturalis, sive de iure naturae humanae demonstrationes mathematicae, Berlin, 1704.

WOLFF, C., 1679-1754 [philosopher, mathematician and jurist, professor of Mathematics and Natural Philosophy at Halle, 1706-23, after troubles there, professor at Marburg, but restored to Halle by the action of Frederick the Great in 1740 as professor of jus naturae et gentium, a friend of Leibniz, and one of the great figures in the history of German philosophy. Gierke refers to his]

- (1) Jus naturae methodo scientifica retractatum, Frankfort and Leipzig, 1740-50;
- (2) Institutiones juris naturae et gentium, Halle, 1750 (In German, under the title of Grundsätze des Natur- und Völkerrechts, 1754),
- (3) Rational Thoughts on the social life of mankind, and particularly on the Commonwealth [von dem gemeinen Wesen], Halle, 1721.

INDEX TO GIERKE'S TEXT AND NOTES

References to the notes are in italic figures

Absolutist theory of politics (see also Ruler). 41, 44, 45, 199, 141-8, 166, 291-2, 265-6, 396, 340

Achenwall 126, 148, 157, 178 291, 320, 322, 325, 346, 347, 381, 387, 388, 390, 391

Acts of corporate bodies. 187-8, 271, 308-90

Althusius 37, 45, 46, 48, 51, 53, 64, 70-7, 106, 164, 292, 240, 241, 243, 244, 246, 247-9, 255-6, 256-7, 277-8, 341

Aristocracy 49 311, 337, 342, 345

Aristotle 36, 46, 155, 163 260-1, 266, 269, 304

Arnoldus 36, 60, 67, 230, 266, 270, 272, 355

Associations (natural-law theory of) 62-92, cf. also 162-98 279, 320, 331-2, 367 ff, 372-3, 375, 379-81. See also Classification

Auctoritas (Hobbes's theory of): 82

Barclay 291, 265-6

Beccaria 106, 298

Bellarmino 87 284

Besold. 97, 57, 86, 155

Beza (de jure magistratum). 291, 249, 255

Bill of Rights 143, 309

Blackstone 144

Bodin. 37, 40, 59, 64-7, 231, 250, 251, 265, 269-71, 272, 274, 275

Boehmer 123, 144, 155, 171-2, 173, 174, 183, 185, 312, 338-9, 340, 363, 375-7, 385, 386, 397

Bornitus 67, 265, 271-2

Bosuet. 105 295, 296, 297, 336, 340

Burke 107 348, 359-60, 370

Busius 68 272, 274

By-laws (statuta) of associations. 189: 273, 376, 378, 379, 390

Calvinism: 70, 88-9, 92, 151: 284-5

Capital Punishment: 106. 297-8, 304

Centralist theory of associations. 62-9, 163-4, 165-9, 180-4

Churches Bodin on, 65. Suarez on, 68: Church and State, 87-92, 198: 287-7. Church based on contract, 110. property of Churches, 90, 92, 167: 287, 370-1, 374

City-State 63, 76

Civilians' 37-8 (see also Corporation, Roman-law theory of)

Clarke: 53, 56, 60, 115, 123, 235

Classification: of States, 296 of collegia, 270, 277-8 of associations generally, 279, 367 ff, 377-8, 379-81

Coccejus, H. and S. de, 144, 175: 296, 331, 368

Collective theory of Group-personality. 45-7, 49, 56, 69, 116-17, 118, 120, 121, 123, 124, 126-7, 128, 130-1, 134, 135-7, 139, 181, 182, 184, 193-4, 242-3, 244-5, 249-50, 260, 274, 281, 297, 312-3, 316, 317, 318, 326, 384-5, 393

Collegium: 90-2: 287

Collegiate magistrates. 66-7, 177, 182, 270, 360

Collegium 64-7, 72, 171-2, 177, 270-8, 274, 277, 279, 375, 377, 380, 385

Commons (village) 69. 275-6

Communio (of property). 103, 192, 294, 393

Communitas (Suarez's theory of). 64 274, 276-7

Community (Gemeinde): Fichte on, 151-2 351

Concession (groups created by) 66, 166, 174, 368, 378

Confederations 86, 197 283, 296

Conquest (rights of). 261

Courting. 36, 92 290, 296

Constitutionalism 139, 140, 141-8, 151-3, 346-7 (see also Limited Sovereignty)

Continuity: of the People: 299 of the State, 50, 56, 160, 161, 260-1, 266, 325, 361 of the original contract, 110: 299

Contract, general theory of 46, 48, 51, 53, 56, 59, 60-1, 62, 63, 70, 71, 73-4, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 90, 92, 95, 102, 104, 106-7, 107-11, 113, 128-30, 131-2, 134, 135, 145, 148, 149, 164, 169, 185, 186, 243, 247, 257, 364, 366, 367, 399-300, 301-5, 312, 314-15, 317, 319, 323, 325, 335, 341, 351, 384

Contract of government (Herrschervertrag). 48, 60, 107-8, 122, 145, 151, 171: 267, 304, 335, 347, 351

Contract of property: 104. 295

Contract of society (Gesellschaftsvertrag) · 48, 60, 107-8, 149, 166: 301, 304

Corporate bodies · natural-law theory of, 162-98 367-98, cf. also 62-92 (and 269-78, 280-1)

Corporation (Roman-law theory of · see also universitas) · 45, 62, 67, 68, 75, 84, 135, 162, 173, 174, 182-240, 275

Corporative articulation (of the State) · 64, 65, 164, 165, 166 (see Intermediate Groups)

Corpus · 64-7, 80-272, 277

Corpus confederatorum · 86, 197 283

Customary Law: 68, 189, 274, 288-9, 373

Danies · 121, 125, 148, 175: 291, 316, 320, 322, 346, 347, 366, 379

Debts of corporate bodies · 79, 84-280, 288

Delicts of corporate bodies · 67, 69, 79, 83-4, 118, 181, 189-90 271, 280-1, 281-2, 318, 363

Demesne (of Ruler) · 365-6

Democracy · 49, 58, 117, 141, 146, 237, 288, 290, 297, 311, 335, 344, 346, 354

Divine right (see also Theocratic) · 87-8

Dominicans · 96, 87

Dominum emmuni · 103, 162-261, 304, 352, 366, 379

Double majesty (theory of) · 43, 44, 45, 48, 54-5, 140, 258 ff., 363

Double Subject of sovereignty (Grotius's theory of) · 55-8, 140 261, 334

Dualism (of theory of Group-personality) · 121 (see also Collective and Representative)

Dualism (of theory of State-personality) · 53, 54-5, 58, 59, 60, 145, 150, 156-7 256-7, 332-3

Ecclesiastical Theorists (Catholic) · 36, 45, 46, 51, 59, 67, 69, 87-8, 105-229, 239, 244, 240, 241-3, 269-4, 270, 272-3, 275-6, 283-4 (see also Theocratic)

End of the State · 41, 112, 113 305-7, 310

Ends of Society and social groups · 111-14

England · 101, 128, 142, 144, 157: 347-8, 359, 360, 375

Enia moralia (Pufendorf's theory of) · 118-19 312-3

Ephorate (idea of) · 151-2 247-9, 328, 351

Episcopal system · 88, 89

Estates (the three) · 48, 50, 65, 75, 88, 143, 144, 146, 148, 165, 177 247, 249, 271-2, 346, 356, 357, 374, 382

Family (theory of) · 63, 65, 71, 72, 80, 83, 105, 111, 163, 170 269, 274, 303, 318, 319, 321, 367, 368, 392

Federalist theory of associations · 70-9, 164-5, 169-80, 184-95

Federations · 71, 86, 196-8 283, 395-8

Fellowship theory of, in Althusius, 71-6, in Grotius, 78 in Nettelbladt, 184-95 general references · 69, 116, 117, 118, 123, 124, 135, 163, 164, 165, 172, 175, 177, 180, 181, 183 277, 308

Fénelon · 105 343, 355, 364

Ferguson · 105 297, 310

Fichte · 101-2, 104, 107, 131-4, 136, 151-2, 164, 168 292-3, 295, 298, 300, 301, 302, 310, 317-8, 351, 373-4, 395

Fiction (ficta persona) · 47, 56, 69, 119, 123, 135-6, 137, 191 245, 247, 250, 275, 317-18, 320, 332, 370

Filmer · 266, 309, 336, 340

Foundation (Stiftung) · 134, 168, 184, 369-70, 374, 386

France · 65, 66, 128, 130, 142, 166, 183

Frederick the Great · 292, 300, 332, 352, 360

Freedom of Conscience · 90, 113 285, 308

French Revolution · 95, 114, 130, 166-7 370-1

Fundamental laws · 341-2, 343, 344, 345, 346, 353

General Will (volonté générale) · 47, 127, 129, 131, 133, 134, 156 322-3, 324-5, 327, 329

Gentilis · 363

Germany · 65, 70, 73, 86, 95, 101, 124-5, 131, 142, 146, 154, 155, 156, 159, 164, 167, 179, 185, 194, 198 249, 347, 355, 356, 357, 360, 368, 382-3, 397, 398

Gesamte Hand · 185, 192, 194-356, 393

Government (Rousseau's theory of) · 130, 150, 158-9, 346, 349-50

Graszwinkel · 363-9

Gregorius (of Toulouse) · 36, 51, 59, 67 290, 291, 295, 270, 271, 282

Grotius · 36, 45, 46, 50, 51, 55-8, 77-9, 86, 90-2, 100, 106, 140 229, 234, 241, 244, 247, 250, 251-2, 253-4, 260-3, 279-80, 282, 283, 285-6, 324, 364

Groups · natural-law theory of, to 1650, 62-92 after 1650, 95-6, 105-37, 162-98. reception and exclusion of members, 307-8 (see also Associations)

Group-authority · 81, 105-7, 112, 176-8, 183-273, 360, 365, 367

Group-personality · 76, 81-2, 84, 114-37, 139, 193 312-13, 321, 338

Guilds 66, 172, 180, 374, 382-3
 Gundling 121, 123, 144, 155, 182: 295, 317-8, 334, 338, 335, 383-4

Hanseatic League: 86, 362
 Heincke 144, 155
 Heineccius 147, 155, 175: 291, 319, 344, 379, 388
 Herder 105: 305, 332-3
 Hert 121, 122-3, 147, 155, 170-1, 182, 185, 315, 316-7, 330, 344, 356, 395-6, 397
 Historical theory (of Law and the State): 104, 111, 223-6
 Hobbes 37, 41, 44, 51, 60-1, 79-84, 97, 101, 106, 108, 112, 115, 116, 118, 136, 138, 139, 141, 143, 164, 169, 170, 181: 232, 247, 250, 251, 254, 266-9, 281-2, 283, 288, 306, 330, 347
 Hoffbauer 127, 148, 178-9, 291, 309, 329, 334, 360, 381, 390, 392
 Holy Roman Empire 85, 86, 196, 197: 282, 397
 Horn 105-6, 111, 115-6, 141, 142: 289, 295, 304, 311, 333, 336-7, 340, 354, 366
 Hotoman 231, 254, 255
 Huber 106, 117, 145-6, 155-6, 173-4, 182-3, 184, 269, 300, 308, 340-2, 356, 362, 377-8, 384-5, 386
 Hugo 86
 Humboldt (W von) 127, 179, 194-5: 303, 397
 Hume 111, 305, 307, 369
 Ickstatt 144, 315, 318, 321-2, 334, 361
 Individual (and Group) 68-9, 78-9, 96-105, 106, 114, 129, 130, 135-6, 193-4, 242, 243, 281
 Individualism (see also Collective) 52, 55, 61, 71, 76-7, 84, 96, 101, 102, 110, 112, 113, 120, 121, 126, 129, 131, 134, 136, 139, 159, 193-7: 266-7, 290-9, 306-7, 310
 Institutions (Groups regarded as) see Foundation and State-institutions
 Insurance Society (State as) 113, 131: 307-8
 Intermediate groups 72, 163, 164, 166, 167, 367-8, 381-2
 International law 97, 99, 133, 134, 195-6: 319, 329, 334, 377, 394-5 International society 85-6, 96-7, 195-6: 282-3, 394-5
 'Irregular' States 356, 397
 Jesuits 36, 87 (see also Molina and Suarez) Jury 353
Jus divinum (i.e. revealed Law) 98
Jus gentium 38-9, 85: 233, 234
 Just: 153, 159, 164, 168: 292, 293, 307, 309, 331, 332-3, 333-4, 360, 374-5, 395
 Kekermann 205, 279
 Krettmayr 144
 Law: divisions of, 38-9, 233 law, and state of nature, 96 ff. law, and community, 100 law, and morality, 98, 100, 102, Gierke's conception of, 223-6 the view of Thomasius, 266-9, 308 of Fichte and Kant, 393 (see also Public Law and International Law)
 Leibniz 104, 137, 146, 157, 164, 175, 196, 197, 296, 316, 331-2, 343, 357, 368, 397
 Liberty of association 72, 78, 80, 168, 169, 171, 172, 179, 180, 194: 279
 Liberty and equality 101, 103, 112, 196, 292 (see also Natural rights)
 Limited sovereignty (see also Constitutionalism) 43, 44, 45, 48, 57, 59, 141-8, 154, 239, 262, 264, 339, 341-3, 344, 346, 347, 354-5
 Limits of the State 305-6 (see also End of the State)
 Local communities (Gemeinde) 62-3, 67, 69, 71, 73, 74, 78, 163, 164, 175, 177, 180, 185, 279, 307, 368-9, 372, 380-1, 382-3, 384 (see Municipalities)
 Locke 101, 103, 106, 113, 128, 136, 149, 157, 292, 294, 299-300, 302, 303, 307, 324, 342-9, 357-8
 Loyer 49, 343, 369
 Ludewig 369
 Lugo 276
 Lutheranism 88: 284
 Machiavelli (Group regarded as) 52, 61, 136, 254, 330, 331
 Mackintosh 370, 378
Majestas (see Sovereignty, Double majesty, Real majesty, Personal majesty) Majority decision 47, 69, 78, 82, 83, 110, 117, 120, 127, 128, 129, 131, 133, 134, 186, 188, 197: 247, 275, 280, 281, 311, 315, 318, 321-2, 323, 324, 325, 327, 328, 361, 364, 365, 367, 369-90, 395-7
 Mandatum 125, 135, 161
 Marriage 77, 92, 123, 194: 241, 303, 317, 392
 Meeting (right of) 80, 166, 168: 271, 368
 Merchant companies 80: 261, 262, 363

Mercier de la Rivière: 331, 336

Mevius: 196: 290-1, 295, 306, 312, 331, 336, 361, 394

Middle Ages: 35, 38, 40, 50, 52, 59, 71, 103, 154, 165, 196, 306

Milton: 243, 248

Mirabeau 571

Mixed Constitution: 41, 42-3, 44, 48, 58, 59, 60, 138, 148, 153, 154-9, 197-235-7, 239, 264-5, 324-6

Molina: 45, 51, 59, 105, 107, 241, 242-3, 263, 273, 275-6

Monarchomachy: 45, 53, 106, 231, 254-5, 256

Monarchy (see also Patrimonial monarchy and Ruler): 43, 49, 116, 141-8, 237, 238, 238, 239-7, 338, 340-2, 362-3

Montesquieu: 104, 152-3, 157, 159, 179, 197, 296, 298, 309, 352, 358, 361-2, 366, 397-8

Moral persons (personas morales): 97, 118-22, 124-7, 129, 130-1, 133, 134, 135-7, 142, 160, 166, 168, 169, 175, 181, 184, 185, 186, 187, 192-4, 195, 196, 208, 313-4, 315, 317, 318-9, 320, 321, 324, 326, 327, 329, 345-6, 360, 366, 393, 394

Möser: 104, 107, 179-80, 194, 294, 298, 309, 328, 362-3

Municipalities (rights of): 273, 277, 368-9, 376, 382, 383

Natural Law: general view, 35-40, 95-6, 97-103, 233-4, 235, 268-9, 289-91, 293

Natural origin of Society: 46, 51, 63, 108, 111, 300

Natural rights of Man: 61, 112, 119-4, 198, 234-5, 290, 306, 308-9

of Societies: 176, 178, 379, 380, 391

Netherlands: 70, 86, 347, 397, 398

Nettelbladt: 126, 148, 164, 165, 175-8, 185-91, 197-8, 291, 315, 320, 345-6, 360, 379-81, 387, 388-93, 394, 395, 398

Obligation of groups, 130, 189, 303, 304, 390-1 of international law, 85-6, 196

of Natural Law, 97-100, 289, 290

of Ruler by acts of predecessors, 161, 251, 261, 266, 362-4

Omnis ut singulis et ut universi: 47, 49, 79, 245, 275, 311, 389

Organic conception of Society: 50-2, 114, 132-3

Organic metaphor (body politic): 51, 132, 136, 234-4, 268, 319, 320, 324, 326, 330-1, 332

Organs (of State): 51, 130, 133, 139: 332

Otto: 159

Paine: 325, 331, 359, 374-5

Paley: 90, 339-60, 372-3

Papacy: 87, 92, 282, 284

Parliaments: 80, 83, 149, 281, 347-8 (see also Estates and Representation)

Partnership (see Societas, partnership in sovereignty, 155-6, 356-7, the State as a partnership, 107, 298)

Patrimonial monarchy: 57, 58, 143, 144, 229-60, 339, 340, 362-3, 366

People as a societas, 241, 244-5, 266: as a universitas, 240, 244, 342, 344, 345-6 as a personality, 45-8, 265-6, sovereignty of, see Popular sovereignty rights of, see Popular rights will of, 245-6, 329

people and Church, 89, 287 people and State, 53-4, 61, 244-5, 255-6, 329, 333

Grotius's view, 54-8, Hobbes's view, 60-1, 268, Althusius's view, 74; Rousseau's view, 127-30 position of, in absolutist theory, before 1650, 58 ff, after 1650, 141 ff

Person (persona): 56, 82, 122 (see also Group-personality, Moral persons and Personality)

Personal majesty: 54-5, 237, 258, 259, 260, 333

Personality: individual, 134-5 of groups (see Group-personality) of People and Ruler, 44-50, 265-6 of the State, 50-61, 116-7, 129, 133, 139, 146, 152, 256, 258, 266, 268, 319, 332, 361

Physiocrats: 113, 294, 307, 336

Poland: 156, 279, 340, 354, 357, 363

Politics (as distinct from public or constitutional law): 36, 137 (treatises on, 229-30, 230-1, 232)

Popular rights: 57, 58, 141 ff, 145, 146, 241-2, 249, 255, 258, 259, 268, 269-4, 337, 339, 340, 341-2, 344, 345, 352, 357-4

Popular sovereignty: 43, 44, 48, 52, 56, 106, 128-30, 131, 134, 140, 147, 149-53, 158, 298, 245, 248-9, 258-9, 260, 262, 322, 328, 335, 347-9, 350, 352, 353-4

Positive Law in relation to Natural Law, 38, 100, 102, 103, 185, 233-5, 288-9, 290, 293

Protestants of Church and State, 87 ff: 284

Powers' separation of, 134, 152-3, 154-6, 263, 264-5, 329, 332, 334, 336, 337-60

Primary Assembly in Rousseau, 130, 131, 133, 150, in Fichte, 133, 151-2

Procuratorial power: 47 (see also Representation)

Property origin of, 103-4: 293-5 (see also Contract) property of associations, 168, 171, 172, 188-9, 191, 192-3 271, 370-2, 376, 383, 391, 392
 Church-property, 90, 92, 167 287, 290-1, 374
 State-property, 53, 54, 57, 59, 161-2, 255, 259, 268, 337-8, 352, 364-6
 Protestantism: its theory of the Church, 88-92: 284-7
 Provinces rights of, 65, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75 277, 384
 Public Law 36, 37, 38, 39, 97, 137, 172-3, 339, 361-2, 377
 Pufendorf 103, 106, 107, 118-21, 142-4, 146, 147, 154-5, 169-70, 181, 184, 196-7 289, 294, 295, 301, 308, 309, 311, 318-16, 330, 337, 345, 361, 368, 364, 367, 375, 383, 396, 397

Reason d'Etat 96, 290
 Real majesty 54-5: 237, 244, 258, 259, 338
 Reason as basis of Natural Law, 98-9, 289, 293: as basis of Contract, 109, 301-2
Rechtsstaat 138 Kant's view of, 307-8
Regimen Grotius's theory of, 91 285-6
 Representation theory of, 47, 61, 79, 81-5, 116, 130, 131, 133, 134, 150, 160-1, 247-8, 285-6, 327, 328, 347-8, 350 (see also Estates and Parliaments)
 Representative theory of Group-personality 61, 82-4, 116-7, 118, 120, 121-2, 123, 128, 130, 135-7, 139, 173, 181, 184, 194 267, 312-3, 316, 317, 323
 Republics 49, 116-298, 249, 251, 304, 318
 Renaissance theory of, 70, 72, 75, 152, 290, 337, 341-2, 344, 345, 347, 349, 351, 354, 364
Respublica 53, 60, 65, 115 235, 254-5, 255-6, 257, 258, 265, 334, Respublica componita, 198 278, 308
 Right (Recht) definition of, 39 Fichte on, 102 293 Kant on, 295, 307-8
 Rights of Man (see Natural rights)
 Rousseau 41, 48, 54, 97, 101, 104, 106, 108, 112, 128-31, 133, 136, 149-50, 158-9, 164, 166, 167 258, 298, 304, 307-8, 301, 302, 303, 305, 306, 322-3, 324-5, 326, 327, 330, 333, 349-50, 358, 369-70
 Ruler: personality of, 48-50, 123: 256, 344, two capacities of, 161, 251-2, 361-2 sovereignty of, 43, 48, 54-8, 58-60, 140, 141-8 238, 245, 268, 322, 323, 338-9, 341-2, 353, 354 Ruler and Natural Law, 97-8

 Ruler and Mixed Constitution, 154 ff.

Salamonius: 53 291, 249, 256
 Scheidemantel 126, 148, 168-9, 310, 321, 346, 347, 356, 372-3, 396
 Schlözer, A. L. 127, 148, 159, 170 295, 298, 309, 307, 322-3, 331, 334, 347, 360, 381, 396, 397
 Schlozer, C. 127 322, 323, 389-90
 Schmier 121, 147, 155, 174: 292, 300, 334, 335, 344, 355, 368, 378, 385
 Secession, right of, 70, 110 302
 Sidney: 106, 149 299, 347-8, 357
 Sneyd 107, 131, 169 298, 307, 309, 346-7, 351, 350, 358-9, 371-2
 Sociability, theory of 100-1 290, 301
 Social Natural Law 101, 196, 290-1
Societas, conception of 40, 45, 46, 51, 60-1, 63, 68, 75-7, 77-8, 95, 100, 107, 115, 118, 129-7, 135, 137, 138, 163, 169, 173-4, 175, 180-1, 182, 183, 184, 185, 241, 244, 274, 278, 279, 290, 319-21, 379, 380, 385
Societas gentium 85 288-3, 303, 394-5 (see also International society)
Societas classification of, by Bodin, 64-7 270, by Althusius, 71-3 277-9, by Nettebladt, 177-8 379-80, by other writers, 367-8
Societas aquiles and marquales 123-4, 127, 128, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176-7, 183, 185, 186, 187, 189, 196, 197 280, 316, 318, 320, 321, 375, 380, 385-6, 397, 399
 Society: general theory of, 62, 75-6, 78 (see also Associations and Groups)
 Soto 45 263
 Sovereignty problem of, 37: 236, natural law theory of, down to 1650, 40-4, 71, 74 245, 249, 263, 267 residence of, 44-61 258, sovereignty and groups, 62, 64 (see State-control of Groups), sovereignty and international law, 85 sovereignty in federations, 85, 197; sovereignty and churches, 87 ff: 285-6, natural-law theory of, from 1650 to 1800, 137 ff. 311, 334, 338-9, 342-3, 345, 346, 352
 Rousseau's view of, 129-30, 324, 349, 358
 (See also Limited sovereignty: Personal majesty, Popular sovereignty, Real majesty, Ruler)

Spinoza 97, 106, 108, 112, 117, 142, 164.
 306, 311, 336, 355, 369

State of nature 83, 96–105, 195, 196
 268, 291–2, 304

State-control of Groups 66–7 270, 268 ff., 373, 378–9, 381

State-institutions (Anstalten). associations regarded as, 66, 67, 168, 180–4, 185, 194 269–70, 370–2, 373–4, Church
 regarded as, 90, 265, 370–2

Stryck 144

Suarez 36, 45, 46, 51, 59, 64, 68, 69, 105
 229, 242, 243, 264, 273–4, 276–7, 282, 283

Subject (or owner) of rights the Subject of Sovereignty, 42 ff., Grotius's theory of the double Subject, 55–8, Hobbes on the Subject of Sovereignty, 60–1,
 139 Rousseau, 129

Switzerland 65, 70, 86 347, 397, 398

Systems Hobbes on, 79–84, federal systems, 86, 196, 197 396

Taxation 68, 162 274, 276

Territorial theory of the Church 89 ff. 285

Teutonic ideas of Fellowship (q v.), 135, 191, of kingship, 135, of the Law-
 State (see Rechtsstaat), 138

Theocratic ideas 40, 87, 104, 105, 111
 295–6, 303–4 (see also Ecclesiastical)

Thomasius 98, 100, 113, 121, 144, 155,
 196 288–9, 296, 300, 308, 315, 316,
 339, 367, 375, 394, 395

Titus 121, 144, 155, 173 315, 316, 356,
 361–2, 368–9, 395, 397

Trust. Locke's conception of, 299–300, 348–9

Turgot. 166: 309, 369

Unanimity (as opposed to majority decision) 47, 110, 127, 133, 186, 188, 195 246–7, 322, 324, 328

Unions of States (personal and real): 86, 197 283, 395–6

Universitas: 45, 56, 61, 64 ff., 73, 79, 91, 116, 117, 123, 146, 171, 173–4, 177,
 181, 182–3, 184, 186, 187, 189, 191,
 192 240, 271, 272, 274, 281, 316, 317,
 318, 328, 329, 384–5, 386, 392

Unruly position of, 363–4

Utopias 166 369

Vacancy of throne, 339–40

Vasquez 253, 263

Vattel 40

Venice 156

Vico 105 297

Victoria 263, 283

Vindictas contra Tyrannos: 45, 70 231, 240, 247, 248, 254, 255, 257, 277, 283

Voctius 92 287

Will of All 129, 131 245–6, 322–3, 326, 328, 329 (see General Will)

Wolff 113, 121, 125, 147–8, 175, 185, 196,
 294, 296, 308, 316, 319, 344, 345, 357,
 379, 388, 389, 390, 393, 395

World-State 85, 196 283, 395

Zepper 284–5

Zwingli 285

CAMBRIDGE: PRINTED BY W LEWIS, M.A.
AT THE UNIVERSITY PRESS

SALAR JUNG MUSEUM LIBRARY
(Occidental Section)

Unless the book is returned on or before the due date given below, a fine of 6 nP.
will be charged for each day.

